"Yours, truly,

"FRANK P. BLAIR.

"WASHINGTON, August 7, 1866.

"Mr. PRESIDENT: I respectfully request that you appoint Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby to be a major in the reorganized Army of the United States. His military record is clear; his testimonials from superior officers under whom he served during the late war ample and eulogistic; wounds attest his devotion; his discharge from the volunteer service is honorable and satisfactory. He seeks to use the skill attained in service to promote the glory of his country, and would spend his life in a pursuit into which he early entered in the hour of peril and doubt. He entered the service from my State and my district, and I but express its appreciation of him as a gentleman and officer by, in their name, soliciting for him your kind recognition in the office I ask for him.

"I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

"JOHN HOGAN.

"General Kirby has applied for a captaincy, but his service entitles him to the majority which I understand will open from Missouri. I hope the President will give it to him. As Mr. Hogan states, no man has done better service than General Kirby. All his superiors attest his capacity, courage, and devotion to the country. He is a great favorite also with those who served under him; and with the people of Missouri.

"AUGUST 9, 1866.

"SILVER SPRING, August 25, 1866.

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Frank writes desiring his brother and me to promote as far as we can the appointment of General Kirby in the regular service. I know of no better means than stating the facts as to his deserts in as few words as possible. He is a self-made man, beginning to work for himself at the age of fourteen without means. He gave up the little business on which he was thriving at the commencement of the rebellion, and, raising a company at his own expense in Saint Louis, began in aiding Frank's efforts there. He rose in his regiment through all the grades to lieutenant-colonel, and was mustered out with it after three years' service. He then re-entered the service as lieutenant-colonel of Twenty-seventh Regiment Missouri Volunteers. He was immediately detailed as chief picket-officer of Seventeenth Army Corps, and was successively brevetted colonel and brigadier-general on active service to the close of the war. He fought as captain at the battles of Fort Henry, Fort Donelson, at Shiloh, Chickasaw Bayou, Arkansas Post, Champion Hills, Jackson, and siege of Vicksburgh. After Vicksburgh, as lieutenant-colonel, he was engaged in the battles of Chattanooga, Resaca, Dallas, and Kenesaw Mountain, and then as chief picket-officer in all the battles and skirmishes his position involved on Sherman's advance to Atlanta, and the march to the seaboard, and the point of Johnston's surrender. General Howard, in his recommendation, says: 'He was chief picket-officer' in the van of his army, and adds, 'a position requiring more than ordinary sagacity, intelligence, and bravery. In Colonel Kirby these qualifications were found to a remarkable degree. He was prompt and energetic, and when I knew that a line had been placed or inspected by him, I knew that it was well done. He was often selected to conduct hazardous expeditions. I have had frequent occasion to witness his coolness and bravery in dangerous positions.' He heartily recommends him for the position he seeks. General Sherman recommends, and says: 'He served under me in various capacities during the war, and was universally esteemed a most active, intelligent, and zealous officer. I shall deem it but an act of justice if he should receive from the Government of the United States an acknowledgment of his merit and services.' On this General Grant indorses: 'I concur in the statement of General Sherman as to merits of Brevet Brigadier-General Kirby. He proved himself a most gallant and meritorious officer.' Generals Logan, Belknap, and Blair, under whom he served, go more into detail, and accord the hightest praise. He was thrice severely wounded, and had three horses shot under him.

"With great regard, yours, affectionately,

"F. P. BLAIR.

"WASHINGTON CITY, August 27, 1866.

"To His Excellency the PRESIDENT:

"Your attention is respectfully called to the recommendations which the State of Missouri (through her Representatives) has made concerning the appointment of Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby (late chief picket-officer Seventeenth Army Corps) to the position of major, United States Army.

"Since the interview between your excellency and the delegates of Missouri to the Philadelphia convention headed by Hon. John Hogan, at which time the above-mentioned recommendations were handed you, we have learned that the name of George W. Schofield has been placed upon the list for appointment to be accredited to Missouri. General Schofield is not and never was a resident of the State of Missouri. He is, and has been, a resident of the State of Illinois. It is true that in the latter part of 1861 he received a commission in a Missouri regiment, of which his brother (Major-General John M. Schofield) was major.

"We have recommended General Kirby as a Missourian, who resided there before the war, and who in 1861 was one of the first to rush to the defense of the Government. His course through the war is a matter of history; no officer, regular or volunteer, can show a better record. He is a self-made man, relying not upon the influence of relations for promotion, but, as the testimonials of Generals Grant, Sherman, Howard, Blair, Logan, Smith, and other officers with whom he has served will show, he has by his zeal, devotion, fearless bravery, and good judgment, advanced himself from a captaincy in the Eighth Missouri to the position of brevet brigadier-general and chief picket-officer of the Seventeenth Army Corps. We have been led to believe that Missouri should receive one of the majorities in the Army. If so, we present again the name of D. T. Kirby as the choice of Missouri; and in this connection allow us to say that General Schofield neither claims to be nor is he recognized by us as a resident of Missouri. Therefore we ask that our petitions and recommendations be not ignored without just and reasonable cause, but simply ask you to do justice, and render unto Missouri that which is due to Missouri.

"SAMUEL BRECK,
"Assistant Adjutant-General."

The committee therefore adopt said Senate report as the report of this committee, and report the accompanying bill for his relief, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have an explanation of the bill. This gentleman was in the service, and went out in consequence of what seems to have been a court-martial.

Mr. VEST. I think I can answer any question in relation to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know nothing about it except what I get from the report. As I understand, this gentleman was in the Army and was court-martialed; but the court-martial was defective. He went out of the service. What year was that?

Mr. VEST. It has been, I think, about four years ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since the Army was reorganized?

Mr. VEST. Four or five years ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me this does injustice to every officer of the Army under the grade of captain, to which grade this man would be restored. It seems to me it is an act of injustice to legislate in that way by putting men in the middle of the calendar of officers. It necessarily does injustice and stops promotion. I can give the Senate two thousand cases of officers who were mustered out unwillingly from the service at the close of the war—officers of the highest merit, who were mustered out and forced into private life at the time the Army was reduced. There has always been great opposition made to the restoration of any one of the discharged officers or any officer into a grade higher than that of second lieutenant in the Army. It is an act of injustice to other officers.

I have no doubt this gentleman is meritorious, and I do not want to stand in the way of any officer or man, but it seeems to me it is not a right thing to do. The present officers of the Army are entitled to their promotion upon the basis of the existing list of the Army, and to deprive them of that does injustice, and this gentleman would find himself in very uncomfortable quarters, I imagine, if he was restored to the Army under a bill of this kind. I have often heard Army officers speak of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past one has arrived, and the morning hour has closed.

Mr. VEST. The bill will come up to-morrow, then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir, to-morrow morning.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS ACT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. INGALLS on the 12th of January:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the act of January 25, 1879, commonly known as the arrears of pensions act, ought not to be repealed.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. INGALLS to the amendment of Mr. BUTLER, to insert, before the word "soldiers," the words "needy or disabled;" so as to make the amendment read:

And that Congress ought to enact a law granting a pension to the needy or disabled soldiers of the Mexican war.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, there is no room to doubt that the resolution of my colleague will be passed with or without amendment, and that the legislation known as the arrears of pensions act will in this way receive the concurrence of the Senate. The discussion upon this question has developed two views, one expressed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] to the effect that it would be unjust to persons who had already filed their claims to now repeal the act, not, however, indorsing the propriety of the passage of the act originally, and that of my colleague indorsing the original act not only as one of justice, but in pursuance of an existing legal liability on the part of the Government to those who had served under arms in the war of the rebellion.

And so far as the question of the vote of the Senate is concerned, this matter might be left exactly where it is; but I cannot refrain from referring to the stand taken by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] and the Senator from Misiouri, [Mr. VEST,] as representing a very large class of people in this country who have been supposed to be peculiarly hostile to the national pensioners. The position they have taken is creditable to their heads and to their hearts, and I have no doubt it truly expresses the feeling of the great mass of those who served in the confederate army, and whose representatives they especially are on this floor.

There is one feature, and only one I think, to which I shall refer, and that is the allegation generally and widely made in the press of the country that this act has been promotive of fraud, and that a large number of the claims which have been passed upon under it, and which are being daily allowed, are without foundation in fact; that is to say, that the persons who receive the pensions are not entitled to them. That is a charge which is easily made, and may not be as easily disproved in detail, but I think I may safely challenge the knowledge and the judgment of almost every person when I say that for practical purposes no person who served in the ranks for three years, enduring the hardships of the camp, of the march, of the battle, came out of that service physically as sound and with as strong a hold upon life and with as great a chance for a long lease of that life, as he would have had if he had remained at home. It is within the knowledge of every person who served in either army that such is the case, and it is to the credit, I might say, of the soldiers of the war to suppress the rebellion that so large a number of them have refrained from preferring claims to which they were absolutely entitled, by reason of the diminution of health, by reason of the incurring of disease as the inevitable result of that service.

My colleague treated of the more obvious phase of that question by reference to the records of the Army, showing that a much larger number of persons were reported upon the rolls as having incurred disease and as having been wounded than there were on the pension-roll. But back of all of them are the two million of people who have not found a record there, the two million out of two million and a half, a much larger proportion of whom suffered some serious detriment to their health by reason of the exposures and hardships of military service. Some did not apply because their circumstances were such as not to make a pension a necessity, and I entirely agree with the Senator from Connecticut when he says that the sense of honor among that class of persons is as high as that of any other class, and that they would be the last to prefer a fraudulent claim, or the last to stand by a comrade who would do a similar thing. They put their services upon a higher plane, and not to be rewarded in money merely. And thus it is that a very large number of persons who are entitled to pensions never have made application, and never will. Besides a very large number have made application who have not been able to make the required proof, and in that connection I desire to refer to the statement of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] that there was a presumption that when a person had made an application for a pension, and had not been able to establish his claim, that that failure was indicative that the claim was a fraudulent one.

Any one familiar with the practice of the Pension Office will know that that is not the case. The pensioner is not only required to establish his disability, giving the particular time and circumstances under which it was incurred, together with ample proof on that point, but he is obliged to connect that with his present condition by proving by medical testimony or that of his neighbors, or by both, his physical condition during each year of the time that has elapsed since he was discharged from the Army up to the filing of his application for pension—a very hard thing to do. The shifting of location, the lapse of time destroying recollection, the death of witnesses—all contribute to the difficulty of making proof; and it is not surprising that so many fail, and that many others, actually needy, refrain from making application, knowing its futility. Failure to complete proof under these circumstances is no evidence of fraud. No doubt a large majority who fail are as much entitled as those who succeed, but their proof is not attainable.

I know within the limited acquaintance that I have with that class of persons, of a very large number who were broken down by their service in the Army, who were physically wrecked and who have not applied for pensions. I know one man with whose service in the Army I am familiar who to-day is blind and who has used up the proceeds of his farm in vain endeavors to restore the sight which that service destroyed, and yet who has never applied for a pension although he has been advised time and time again to make the application. Cases of that kind, I doubt not, are within the knowledge of every person who served in the national Army, and yet I do not speak of the class of men who apply with any less degree of honor than of the men who do not apply. The applications indicate not only a loss of health as a consequence of Army service, but financial misfortunes, and it is a fact to-day that the pensions which are paid go to the poorest people, as a class, that there are in the country and people who are poor mainly by reason of their military service. Not only that the service rendered them physically unable to labor as before, but that after the war was over they went back to find the avenues before open to them closed and they were obliged to shift their locations and go to remote portions of the West, and because they had lost the years of harvest during the war which their neighbors had realized; and thus it has happened that the men who sacrificed the most, the men who bore the heat and burden of the day, who periled their lives for their country, were the men who have failed to enjoy their full part of the prosperity which their service brought to the country.

I venture to say that there is a smaller proportion of fraudulent claims allowed under the pension act than under any other branch of public expenditure.

I think that the fraud, if any, consists chiefly in the rating, but however high that may be in a given case it is not at all likely to be beyond actual disability, though it may be higher than contemplated by the statute.

I do not believe that 1 per cent. of the persons who are getting pensions to-day are persons who were not, to some extent, disabled by reason of their military service.

If this were a new question and we were to decide now who and who only should have pensions, I should be willing to accept the proposition made as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, and say that only such persons should have the benefit as were in needy circumstances, and I believe to-day we might well say, and that the Government ought to say, as I have no doubt some day it will say, that no single person who ever rendered meritorious service in the Army in time of war should die in want. But we are now dealing with cases arising under the contract of enlistment, and the only test is that of disability, to be proven in the manner pointed out by the law.

We are liberal with the people's money in a variety of ways. We give largely to the wives of Presidents, without any contract, and where there is no need. We have perpetuated distinctions that prevailed in regard to rank as affecting the pay of the pensioner notwithstanding the fact that the men who served in the ranks came from the same social class, from the same firesides, the same class of men in every way, as the men who commanded them; and one great merit of their service was that they submitted to be commanded by men who were not usually their superiors in intelligence or experience, because only in that way could their service be made effective for the country. They submitted to discrimination in the matter of pay; and that discrimination has been perpetuated in the rate of pensions paid, notwithstanding the reason for it has entirely ceased. Men with the same wants for themselves and of equal merit served side by side, much the larger portion receiving but $16 per month, while the remainder received from $100 to $200, and this disparity exists in the pensions allowed. It is all wrong to characterize these men as fraudulent claimants after all their sacrifices, unless upon the plainest proof, which so far has not been forthcoming.

There was, it is true, a statute of limitations, but the Government had had no right to enact it. It had no right to say that if a man should make an application in five years he should be cut off from the benefit of the contract under which he had enlisted and rendered service.. When the war was over the soldier did not think of a pension, except in an extreme case—such as the effect of a serious wound or total disability from other cause. They were glad to get home, jubilant, buoyant at the results that their courage had won. They did not realize then the damage which had resulted to health from exposure. Their chief concern was to get to work to repairing their fortunes, to resume the labors and relations broken off during their service, and generally to make up for the time lost while serving the country in the Army.

But after a while they began to realize the effect of the service upon their health; disability and disease grew apace. Meanwhile they began as well to realize that they were poor—actually and by comparison—and then and from then on application for pensions were made; and if they have been greatly accelerated in the past few years, it is because increasing disability has brought added poverty.

It was said in debate to-day in reference to a claim pending in favor of a person whom it was proposed to put on the retired list, when he went out of the Army he was wealthy, and he did not want the Government to put him on the retired list; but in the mean time circumstances have changed, his wealth has vanished, he has become poor, and now he says, "The Government which I served, and for which I gave up my health and wrecked myself physically, ought to come in and give me reasonable sustenance during the remainder of my life;" and I say it ought. It is only a question of methods.

The Senator from Connecticut very well remarked that the chief support of the credit of the Government, so far as sentiment was concerned, came from the men who fought for the flag. That is true; but under what circumstances have they done this? They were paid in a currency that shifted in value from day to day, that was worth sixty cents to-day and seventy cents to-morrow. It was usually worth less when they got it than it was when they contracted to get it, but they have not asked the Government to give them the difference, they have not dimmed their patriotism by either claiming to be made whole or in denouncing those more fortunate who had money to lend, and whose investments were enhanced by every victory, and finally doubled in value as a consequence of peace. This is not complained of. It was so nominated in the bond except as to one portion of the debt, which was fixed finally in 1869 in favor of the creditor. There is no complaint now of that even.

But it will not do to take care of one class of creditors alone. The Government may need again to borrow money, and as it has kept faith with those who loaned to it the last time, it will be able to do so; but it may need other armies as well, and its ability to get them promptly may depend somewhat upon the faith it has kept with those who filled the ranks heretofore. The secure position in which we stand among the nations is not dependent upon our Army or Navy, for we have neither, but upon the recognized ability of the Government to put into the field upon short notice armies such as put down the rebellion. And this enables us to avoid the expense of a great military establishment. And so long as the Government fairly meets its contracts to its soldiers it will be able to maintain its present position, relying not upon armies already in the field, but upon the ability to put them there when wanted. Nothing is demanded but what was fairly contracted for and earned, and there is no disposition to complain because one class of creditors were more fortunate in making their contracts, and so were enabled to get more than others less fortunate.

The sum to be raised, while large, is not so by comparison; and every dollar of it is being raised from the war taxes imposed during hostilities, and to which the people have adjusted themselves, and which they pay without murmur or even inconvenience.

It is not for press or people to say that these pension claims are fraudulent because of some lack on the part of Congress in providing legislation which shall completely detect and prevent frauds. The pensioner is not at fault. But, as I said, the frauds do not exist except in a very small way. The claimants are not of a kind that are apt to make fraudulent claims; and the very circumstance of their service, of their physical condition, known to all men, shows conclusively that they are not persons who are claiming from the Government that which is not due.

This question ought to be taken out of debate here as well as elsewhere. Appropriations for pensions ought to be put upon the footing of the regular appropriations that are required and made from year to year for the support of the Government; and this question as to what is to be done with the arrears of pensions act and with the accumulating pensions to be paid under it, ought to be treated just as we treat all appropriations for other expenses; and every year when we come up here and consider this question we ought not to be confronted with a statement calculated to undermine the stability of the Government, calculated to be an affront to the soldier, on a very large number of the most meritorious people of this country, that the country is being defrauded by them, and that these large sums taken out of the Treasury of the Government are taken out without warrant of law and by persons not entitled to them.

We ought to meet this question frankly. No pensioner will object to any proper scrutiny of his case; nobody will object to that; but to come here and assail the pensioners as frauds, to claim in advance without proof that these men are preferring fraudulent claims, is an offense. It ought not to be repeated; slander and vituperation upon hundreds and thousands of the best citizens of this Republic should cease.

I hope, therefore, not only that this resolution will be adopted and by a unanimous vote of the Senate, but that we shall hereafter proceed to the consideration of this question as men mindful of the obligation the Government is under to settle the claims for pensions with the least possible friction, with the utmost endeavor to do full, actual, and complete justice, and that we ought not to complain that the instrumentalities that we have set up, of which we have control, are being daily used and manipulated for the purpose of defrauding the Government. It is pleading the baby act. It is not for Congress to say: "We sat by years and years allowing the Treasury to be plundered, while we had it in our power to prevent it, and all we did was to cry fraud at the pensioner who proved his claim according to the law we made." Back of all these statements is the consciousness of every man that no such frauds are being perpetrated as is claimed, and the cry ought to be stopped.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to debate this question to any extent, and but for the fact that the Senator from West Virginia has offered an amendment, I should not have thought it worth while to speak at all on this subject. The amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia is:

That legislation ought to be promptly reported by the Committee on Pensions, and passed, which will protect the Government against the payment of fraudulent claims, and expedite the payment of the claims of those justly entitled to pensions.

Mr. President, this is in keeping with the repeated declarations made here a year ago and during this session. It was stated repeatedly at the last session of Congress that 10 per cent. of all claims that had been presented for pensions were fraudulent claims. When the proof was challenged there was none forthcoming. It was the idle declaration of somebody, based on the supposition of somebody else. Now it is repeated again at this session, as I say, without any proof. If 10 per cent. of the claims presented be fraudulent, it is the duty of somebody to interpose, and whose duty is it? The pension officers have ample power conferred upon them already to ferret out and discover any frauds that are attempted or that have been perpetrated against the laws of the United States with reference to pensions. It is for Congress to furnish them the means, and that is all that is necessary. It is true that in accordance with what seemed to be the wish of a great number of Senators on this floor the Committee on Pensions have had under consideration a bill, long before this discussion arose, to see if there could be some amendments made to the general pension laws that would facilitate the exposure of frauds or attempted frauds. The Pensions Committee will, in time, report what, in my judgment, will be an improvement upon existing laws; but it is very doubtful whether any great number of fraudulent claims that have already been filed or any great number that may be attempted to be filed will be discovered even by that process.

As the Senator from Kansas said, there will always be some fraudulent claims for notwithstanding the high character he has given to the soldiers, which I fully indorse, there were a great many men of those who were not always moved by patriotic impulses, and there are a great many of them, as there are of men who were not soldiers, who are quite willing whenever they can put their hands into the Treasury of the United States and take out a portion of it, to do so.

It is charged that this arrears of pensions bill has opened the door for frauds. That is not true. It was a simple proposition; it simply said that those who have not got what we think they are entitled to, shall have it. It did not provide the machinery for the detection of frauds that had been done in the very early legislation, and that always existed in this country since we have had a pension law. There is ample opportunity given to the officers, provided we give them the money needed. Mr. Bentley, the late Commissioner of Pensions, said last year that if Congress made the appropriations as it should make them, he had ample facilities for the detection of fraud. The Commissioner can put his clerks into the field and, to an unlimited extent, bounded and controlled only by the appropriation, he can send them from one section of the land to another, and they are clothed by the statute with quasi judicial powers for the purpose of the investigation of frauds.

Mr. President, all this talk about the necessity of new legislation amounts to nothing, and it comes with rather bad grace from the honorable Senator from West Virginia to insist now that there should be some very stringent legislation when he has presided for a long time over a committee that has withheld from the Pension Office the means to make effective the provisions of the statutes that have been in force for the last fifteen or twenty years. I say now that if the Committee on Appropriations will do their duty by the Pension Office, there is no need of any action, in my judgment, on the part of the Pensions Committee, nor on the part of the Senate. We are told by the Commissioner of Pensions that the claims which are filed must rest in his hands in the course of business as it has been done in the past, in his office, for a period of six or seven years. Every Commissioner who has been in that office for years has been appealing to this body and to the House for suitable appropriations to expedite the examination of these claims and to put the pensioners in the condition of having their claims examined and knowing whether they had a just demand against the Government or not. Six or seven years yet will elapse before it will be determined whether the claims filed are honest and just or whether they are fraudulent. That is not the fault of the law; that is not the fault of the officers intrusted with the inforcement of the law; it is the fault of this body and the other branch of Congress who have withheld the necessary appropriations although repeatedly appealed to by the proper officers for assistance.

I am quite willing to vote for stringent laws; but you may put on the statute-book all the laws that the ingenuity of man can contrive, and unless you give to the officials presiding over the Pension Office the opportunity of sending out and inspecting these claims to some extent, you never can ferret out these supposed frauds. And, Mr. President, I would a great deal rather myself that 10 per cent. of the money paid out of the public Treasury should be paid to men who do not deserve it and in violation of the rights of the people, than that 50 per cent. of it should be withheld from the men who are entitled to it, as it has been for years. Upon the claim-list of the Pension Office are found thousands of claims that have been there for six or seven and ten years. They have gone into the pigeon-holes of that office for the want of sufficient clerical force, and the men have gone down to their graves who were entitled to their money as certainly as you and I are entitled to the compensation allowed us for services in this Chamber. Every day they are going in that way; the children of soldiers who are entitled to pensions are growing up in ignorance because we withhold from the soldier's family that which ultimately we shall admit is his just and proper due, and we do it because there is an idea in this body and the other that the people of the United States will not sustain us in voting large appropriations for clerical force in this city. I do not believe it. I believe the public sentiment of this country is that the pensioners shall be paid, and there is a sentiment which demands that they shall be paid promptly and without any unnecessary delay; and whenever the Senate shall come up to that idea and resolve that the officials put over the Pension Office shall have ample and sufficient facilities for determining the character of these claims, and if they are doubtful as to their honesty, send out their clerks, as the statute provides, to make an investigation in the neighborhood where the soldier lives, then they will readily know whether there is 10 per cent. or 1 per cent. or any other per cent. of frauds, as near at least as human knowledge can determine questions of that character.

I only say this, Mr. President, partially in defense of the committee of which I am the chairman, very recently promoted to that position. I want to say one other thing. It has been claimed repeatedly in the public press within the last few days, since the Commissioner of Pensions sent here his little document entitled "Executive Document No. 52," by which it is shown that some day we shall have paid thirteen hundred and forty-seven million and some odd dollars of pensions, I saw it in a metropolitan journal yesterday, that that was to be charged up to the arrears of pensions act, that it was wholly and solely to be attributed to the fact that the pension law was amended as it was by the act of January 25, 1879. There can be nothing more false, nothing more untrue; and yet nine-tenths of the clamor that has been raised in the country about that law arises from the simple fact that the people have been imposed upon as to the cost of the execution of that law.

But, Mr. President, after having paid out such vast sums of money as the legitimate results of the war, if it was true that it took a thousand million dollars and more to pay these arrears of pensions, if they were justly and honestly due, the people of the United States are not disposed, in my judgment, to question whether it ought to be done or ought not to be done with reference to the amount that it may cost.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. I wish to offer an amendment to the pending resolution before the Senator from Arkansas proceeds. At the end of the resolution I propose to insert:

And that the needy and disabled survivors of the Indian wars before the year 1845, including the Black Hawk, Creek, and Seminole wars, should be granted a pension.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, some two or three weeks ago the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] went gunning after the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] on account of some unguarded declarations he made in favor of a protective tariff, but in shooting at the Senator from Vermont he struck the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] like the boy who shot at the buck but killed the doe; but I am afraid the Senator from Kentucky in his speech in that same hunt was like the man whose gun

Aimed at duck or plover
Bears wide and kicks the owner over.

Out of a tariff discussion we have been brought now to the consideration of one of the most important questions—whether incidentally or not I am not able to say—presented to Congress since I have been a member of the body. Connected with this question are some of the most delicate considerations that could come forward to be debated, and I intend, in a few moments, to attempt at least to take a plain and sensible view of this question, and one which I think the country will understand and approve, because I believe it is founded in justice and good sense.

The particular law at which the resolution of the Senator from Kansas is directed is the act of January 25, 1879, which provides:

That all pensions which have been granted under the general laws regulating pensions, or may hereafter be granted, in consequence of death from a cause which originated in the United States service during the continuance of the late war of the rebellion, or in consequence of wounds, injuries, or disease received or contracted in said service during said war of the rebellion, shall commence from the date of the death or discharge from said service of the person on whose account the claim has been or shall hereafter be granted, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension.

This is what is called the pension arrears act, or the arrears of pensions act, as you choose to name it. This is an act ingrafted on legislation already existing giving pensions to these people—these soldiers. When it says the pension shall relate back to the two periods of time designated, it simply states one of the most familiar principles in the proceedings of the courts and different tribunals of the country with which we are at all acquainted. It simply says that if these soldiers establish their claim it shall run from the time when their right or their cause of action accrued, and they shall not be compelled to wait until their children or their children's children are old and infirm before they receive their pension.

Separated now from all other considerations, detached from all other suggestions as to the way and manner of enforcing this law, that is the plain common-sense statement of the proposition, and there can be no question that it is founded in good sense and justice. It can be defended upon all parts of the ground. If it be true that these persons are entitled to their pay from the time that their right accrued, as we render interest upon moneys withheld, as we give damages for property withheld, or damages for services rendered in ordinary transactions, there can be no issue made on the justice of this statute.

Already these pensions were granted to a certain extent. When this measure was before Congress in 1878 and 1879 there was a statement before Congress to the effect that possibly the amount would not exceed $30,000,000. It is very probable that gentlemen relied on that statement made at that time, that the amount would not exceed $30,000,000; and if an amendment had been offered to fix that limit it would perhaps have been adopted; but it was not offered and the bill passed with only three or four Senators voting against it. While I was a member of the Senate at that time, I was absent in Louisiana under the lead and direction and charge of the Senator from Colorado on the Teller investigating committee; but with the information before us then, had I been here, I should have voted for the bill. Since that time it seems that the cost will turn out to be much larger than was anticipated. It seems from a statement presented yesterday by the Senator from Missouri that it will go up to well-nigh $400,000,000. Having passed the law with the best lights before us in 1879, many persons having received their pensions under it, many others being in process of receiving their pensions under this act, can the Congress of the United States afford to stop now and say, "We will repeal this, and we will have no more of this work?" That would be a manifest injustice to other persons, it would be a manifest injustice to the spirit that prompted the passage of the law, and I do not think Congress can seriously contemplate it. If the right to the pension exists it is not worth while to talk of the cost, and especially as on all sides it is admitted we are fully able to meet the expense.

In the best times of Roman history it was said that no Roman general who was a victor in a civil war should receive an ovation, and no soldier should take a trophy from that war; but our civil war certainly grew into one of gigantic proportions, and became such a war as is termed by the authorities a public war, controlled and governed by the principles and rules that control and govern public wars. The Supreme Court of the United States, from the Amy Warwick case down to very latterly, has constantly, persistently held that it was a war in which the existence of the country was at stake, and was to be considered in principle as if it had been carried on against Great Britain, France, and other powers combined.

Rightfully or wrongfully the war was conducted, and these soldiers, going into the field of battle to gamble their lives away against balls of fire, saved the country—it is so written—a country of which all of us now are citizens; a country whose benefits and burdens now we all assume; a country united at this time, or we are living under false pretenses; and the glory and the prowess of those soldiers are the glory and prowess of all parts of the land; and as one of the vanquished, as one of those who went down in that contest, I am not ashamed to acknowledge the propriety of voting these pensions. If they were the victors over us, I yield because I believe no other power on earth but they could have been the victors over us. The policy goes back for years. We have gone on with the arrears system, and we cannot now stop because it costs more than we expected.

If there are frauds in the execution and enforcement of this law, that is the fate of all legislation and all human contrivance. If there be fraud, rank and foul, let us see if we cannot weed it out; let us see if we cannot cut it away if it exists a fact, of which I have no information except the reports on that subject floating around through the country. If we are to repeal this law on that account, then we should be compelled to tear down this magnificent Capitol because it has been reported that in the making of this establishment, in the erection of this building, fat contracts were let out and fraudulent practices engaged in before it was completed. There would not be a system of contracts for furnishing the Army and Navy with supplies which we should not have to abolish, because we hear the cry constantly that there are frauds in them.

This is a huge sum of money, to be sure, but the issue was a huge one; the results were overwhelming in their importance. It made the world in fact change front. I have been taxed for bills of pains and penalties under the form of reconstruction laws; I and my people have been taxed for other expenses growing out of this war. I know of none more deserving and more meritorious than the soldiers who fought the battles of this country; and there is not a soldier of the confederacy that I know of but what is willing to see these men paid, and see them paid not grudgingly but freely and cheerfully.

That, Mr. President, is the sentiment of the country that I represent. As stated yesterday by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] if the tide of battle had gone in the other direction, if our flag had floated forward instead of backward, we would have voted anything to those soldiers who won that fight; and if our soldiers are not pensioned, if they have no bounties and lands, it is the fate of war. It is a risk which they took with the rest of us, and they bear their fortune manfully in this, as they bore their hearts to danger during the war.

I cannot for one afford to turn back because there may be frauds in the matter. If there are frauds, as was stated by the Senator from Kansas who recently addressed the Senate, it is a sad commentary on the law-making power that we cannot unkennel those frauds and strangle them.

Then, Mr. President, I say appropriately and very justly comes the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] that we should frame a system by which to secure and protect the Government in this matter at all points and in every direction. If people receive these pensions who are not entitled to them, let us see if we cannot find them out and curtail them. If persons make false affidavits, let us see if we cannot stop them, arrest and punish them. But we cannot afford to stop this business and refuse the meritorious claims now because of these frauds alone.

The speech of the Senator from Kentucky will have this great benefit to the country of bringing forward prominently these charges that have been made in reference to the execution of this law, its unfaithful execution or its want of execution in the proper spirit, and in that he has done a good service. Then if he or any one else knows of fraudulent practices, let him present them to Congress that they may be remedied, controlled, and suppressed in the end. No soldier, as was said by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] ever shouldered his musket for the paltry sum he received. There is no profession on earth that is not better paid than that. There is nothing to which a soldier could turn his hand to do that he could not make more money than soldiering, even with the pension ordinarily given him by the Government.

And, Mr. President, that brings me naturally to the consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] that Congress ought to enact a law granting pensions to the soldiers of the Mexican war. We have now a limited pension act as to the Mexican soldiers, but I think it is time that act should be enlarged. That act, as stated by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] yesterday, should be made more liberal and more far-reaching. Time is traveling on, and it is well nigh half a century since those services were rendered; and no war in this country and probably no war in any other land added so much glory and so much territory to a country as that war added to ours. The remaining survivors of that war are growing old and some of them decrepit, and almost all of them, within my knowledge at least, are needy. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina is eminently proper and eminently just. The whole services, too, were rendered for a common country and for the common glory of this great country; and now that we are in a good humor in reference to this business let us see if we cannot frame a bill to suppress the frauds in the enforcement of these pension acts and protect the Government, and at the same time to enlarge the circle of the Mexican pension act and give the needy and the wounded and the destitute of that war the benefit of a pension; and let us see if we cannot recognize the fact that we have a common soldiery as we have a common country.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I had not intended when the resolution was first introduced in the Senate, to speak upon it at all, and I shall now occupy the attention of the Senate but for a few moments.

I have never believed that there was any considerable number of persons outside of the Senate, nor any number here, who would favor a repeal of the arrears of pensions act. I had thought at first that the discussion of this question was probably useless, that we should only be occupying the valuable time of this body in a discussion which would be found to be entirely upon one side of the question and upon a question which really did not divide the members of this body; yet it was perhaps true that in the mind of the general public there were some misconceptions as to the scope and reason of the arrears of pensions act which it was well to correct, and which I think have been corrected by the very careful and elaborate discussion of the legal aspect of the question and the progress of legislation upon the general subject of pensions in the address of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

I did not feel, for one, as an individual or as a Republican, that I needed to be making frequent proclamation of my sympathy for the soldier, either for myself or for my party; and so I thought I would not avail myself of the opportunity to say anything whatever upon this question. I am glad to know to-day that I have never found myself in any association of men, political or otherwise, where the rights of the Union soldier were not regarded as sacred, and where there was not the fullest sympathy, not only with him, but with the cause for which he fought. I have never been in any convention where it would have been safe for any man to express an opposition either to the soldier or his cause. I am glad, for one, to have had a sympathy, the current of which has never been broken from the time he first took up the musket and put on the uniform of his country until this hour. I am glad to have been of that number who have sympathized with him, not only when he presented a just claim and confronted the Treasury with the matter, but to have sympathized with him in all the stages of that momentous and bloody struggle through which he brought this nation to triumph. I believe there was never any effort to ameliorate his sufferings in the service or to do him honor since that did not have my hearty approbation.

As to the principle involved in this measure, is it not one that, plainly stated, commends itself to the judgment and sense of justice of every man? I suppose that allowances in the form of pensions are intended in some measure to be compensatory to the soldier for injuries suffered in the cause of his country. If this be true, however meagre and partial these allowances may be, however far they may fall short of the just claim of the soldier, can any man controvert the proposition that the relief should commence with the injury, and be commensurate with it in duration? Can any man assign a good reason why there should be any period of disability, from the time the soldier ceased to draw pay as a soldier until the disability itself is removed, during which he should not have compensation? If we are to look upon claims for pensions in that light, how shall we discriminate them from the case of a man who becomes answerable to another for a physical injury resulting from his neglect? The damages begin from the injury, and they are calculated in the assessment of such damages prospectively to the time when that injury ceases, or for the life of the individual who has suffered the injury. Shall our country establish a rule more severe than that which would prevail between citizens in a court of justice, when she comes to settle the claim of the men who saved the nation? For one, I would as soon barter with a man who had rescued my child from the grave.

We are getting away from the scenes of the war. The circumstances under which those brave men were called from their homes to resist the attempt to destroy the national life have passed into history. The notes which called them to their places in the ranks of our regiments have faded from the ear. But for one I can never forget the enthusiasm with which the enlistment of these volunteers was everywhere received, and the profuse and liberal promises which were made to them for the maintenance of their families and for the liberal and kindly treatment of those who might survive.

As the basis of this measure is settled in good reason and right, why should we agitate the question now of the repeal of a law which simply extends the allowance of the pension to the period when the disability was suffered and in the ratio of the disability? If there have been complaints, and doubtless there have been, of abuses under the law, then without any offense to the soldier we may address ourselves to-day wisely and resolutely to the correction of those abuses. As one who had a small part with them in the work of the war, I may speak for the soldiers to-day, and say that to such legislation they will offer no objection. I believe it is true that if there is a class of men in the country who more than another despise the shirk and the coward, the man who did not bear his fair share with his comrades in the toils of the march, the privations of the camp, and the heat of battle, it is the soldier class; and you will never find the true soldier justifying such a man in any claim that he may make unworthily against his country. Therefore, I am sure that we shall not offend the soldier if we wisely and discretely address ourselves to remedy any defects in the existing law.

It does seem to be anomalous that so much as $500,000,000 should be paid out of the Treasury upon mere ex parte affidavits. I believe it would have been wiser in the beginning if some easy and practical method of trying claims for pensions had been brought close to the soldier in the different States of the Union, where his evidence could have been produced speedily and without expense, and where his claim could have been justly and promptly settled. If it be not too late, it may be well yet to devise some such measure, though I believe the suggestions of the present Commissioner of Pensions will meet all the faults which have been found with the law.

Mr. President, having said only so much, I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate further. I believe that there are neither in nor out of this body many who would demand the repeal of the law if they would but for one moment consider the basis upon which it is justified.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on this resolution, giving the reasons that will control my vote. It is not my purpose to reopen the original question as to whether it was wise or unwise to pass the act granting arrears of pensions. It is enough to say it was passed by a former Congress, and has been partially executed. A very large number of the soldiers who served in the Union Army have already received the benefits of the law, and it seems to me it would be obviously unjust at this stage to repeal the law or suspend its operation as against the remaining soldiers who have not received the benefits. If we should do so we may expect a perpetual agitation of this question until those who have not had the benefits are placed upon a basis of equality with those who have. Without any regard, therefore, to the original merits of this proposition, it is now too late to call in question its legality. It would be unjust to the portion to whom it was denied to refuse to give them compensation for injuries received, which a portion of their comrades have already obtained.

But there are other reasons which control my vote in this case, and I do not refer to them with any view of bringing up the past for discussion in this connection. It cannot be forgotten by this generation that we have had a civil war. As was well observed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] on yesterday, if we of the South had succeeded we would have voted to the disabled of our army any pension that might have been necessary for their relief. We failed to succeed. The Federal Government, controlling the armies of the Union, was the victor. We of the confederacy acquiesced in the results of the war. There were questions that we never would have agreed upon until they were settled by a higher tribunal than that of any court; in other words, they had to be settled by the sword. They had existed from an early period in the Government, and there was no way to come to a compromise that could ever have concluded the discussion. It was closed by the sword. The decision was against us, and we acquiesced. We accepted the terms dictated by the conquerer; and when we did it, honest as we were in the contest, we did it in good faith. We were not bound to remain in this country, or under this Government, if we thought there was a better one elsewhere to which we could go. When the result was known, and we looked at the surroundings, we saw nothing better, nothing in fact so good as this country and this Government. When we returned, therefore, to our allegiance we did it in goood faith; and in accepting the terms pensions to the disabled of the Union Army was an implied part of the terms that there was no chance to avoid. In accepting the terms we agreed to be bound by the usual rules that apply in case of pension to the soldiers of the victorious army, and I do not purpose to act in bad faith on that point, nor do my constituents.

There has been complaint about the frauds that it is said have been practiced under this act. I presume from statements made here by distinguished Republican Senators they believe there have been frauds, but the proposed amendment, as I understand it, looks to the remedy in that case, and I trust it will be faithfully applied.

We of the South should not be the first to agitate this question. We should be slow to agitate it. The Northern and Western States have much the larger portion of the population of this country. They have a great deal more wealth than the Southern States have; and of course this burden falls as heavy or heavier upon them than it does upon us. Under the circumstances, therefore, as long as they are content with any pension act that may have passed, I think we should be content, and not make opposition to it, or raise any agitation on the subject.

But there is another reason why I shall vote for the resolution. The amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] as I understand, was cordially and promptly accepted by the distinguished and able Senator from Kansas. That amendment looks to the pensioning of the disabled and the needy of the soldiers who served against Mexico. To that is offered by the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] an amendment to which I trust there will be no objection, which includes the soldiers who served in the different Indian wars. They fought under the flag of the Union, and they were serving the Union, and I suppose it was a mere omission at the time that they were not inserted in the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina. Therefore, I trust there will be no objection to incorporating the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida. It looks to pensioning a class of surviving soldiers (many of them have passed away) at a period of life when they are aged and infirm, and when they need the help of the Government. They rendered distinguished service. As has already been well said, they annexed an empire of territory and an empire of wealth to the boundaries of this Republic by their valor, and there are good reasons why they should receive as a recognition of their services pensions from the Government; and I am glad to see distinguished Republican Senators ready to do justice to them. It should be so. It shows, as a large proportion of them were Southern men, that we are reaching a point where the bitterness engendered by the late civil strife is fast passing away. Sooner or later it must always be so, otherwise a people once at war with each other would be perpetual enemies. I am glad we have reached the period when we are laying those bitter feelings aside, and when fraternity and harmony once more prevail.

A hundred or more years ago, bitter and flagrant war existed in Canada between the French and English governments and people as to who should control that country. That question, I believe, was finally decided upon the Heights of Abraham, near Quebec, in a terrible battle, where the English commander, General Wolfe, fell in the very moment of victory. The traveler who now goes to those heights and sees the monument to Wolfe, erected on the spot where he fell, has only to go down to the Parliament house, and near that building he will find a shaft that towers up into the air, with an inscription honoring Wolfe on one side, and a like inscription on the other in honor of Montcalm, the French commander. The people of Quebec and of Canada are partly English and partly French. The race feud between them was bitter. But after the war they had to live together; and they put all that aside; and they now do equal honor by the monument they have raised to the commanders who led in the armies on both sides. And the people of both nationalities have equal rights and equal privileges; and they are all loyal to the Government of Great Britain, and it extends to all its equal protection.

So between us and Great Britain. We have had two cruel wars, with great bitterness of feeling engendered; but the bitterness has passed away. And at the centennial at Yorktown, when I stood by and heard Mr. Blaine, the Secretary of State, in that shrill, sonorous voice of his, ring out over the crowds the order of the President for a salute to the British flag—though my grandfather in the Revolution and my father in the war of 1812 fought against that flag—my heart responded with a hearty amen. The war is over between the French and the English in reference to Canada. The two peoples are living together there in harmony, and they unite on the same shaft in rendering the tribute of affection to the honored dead on both sides. The war is over between us and Great Britain, and while we are celebrating our final triumph in the revolution over the British arms, the President of this Republic orders a salute to the British flag. It was gracefully and well done, and it woke the plaudits of tens of thousands of Americans who witnessed the execution of the order. We have had our civil war. That is passed. We have now reached the point where Southern men are ready to do all that is proper to be done to honor and to pension the Union soldiers; and we are glad to see, on the other hand, the response come up that you are ready to do all that is necessary to relieve the necessities of the soldiers, mostly from the South, who served in the war against Mexico and in the respective wars against the Indian tribes.

I say I hail this day with pleasure; I am glad to see it. I trust it will not be long now until a law will be enacted that will do justice to these worthy defenders of the cause of this country and of this Government. I wish the proposition so presented could even go further and become a law. But we shall have reached a great point when the same privileges, the same rights of pension, are extended to the soldiers in the wars already alluded to that have usually been extended by the Government at such a period to all who are indigent or who are disabled.

Under all the circumstances I shall very cheerfully vote for the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas, with the amendments which I understand will be engrafted upon it.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I suppose I shall vote almost alone against these various propositions, but I shall do so for reasons which I will state in a minute. I had supposed that the Senate was a body whose duty it was to enact laws and that it had to act upon measures when they were presented to it in a form in which they could become laws. It seems that we are to change ourselves into a body which is to pass upon declaratory resolutions in advance of any proposition being placed before us, either to keep the other House from acting on bills pending in that body, or to bind ourselves before we see what is going to be presented to vote in a particular way. That seems be the meaning of this resolution and amendment.

One amendment to the resolution declares that all the soldiers of the Mexican war should be pensioned; another provides for all the soldiers of the Indian wars. It seems as though everybody is to have a pension. Whoever set his foot, even for a day, upon the soil of Mexico, whether he ever heard a gun fired, and whether he was wounded or not, is to be pensioned. There are men in the House, and in the Senate perhaps, worth hundreds of thousands of dollars, who never received a scratch in the Mexican or Indian wars, who have no need of a pension at all, who are to be pensioned if these resolutions become laws, and the country is to be taxed to give them a large bonus. That is the proposition as now presented. Six or eight Senators, perhaps, and may be twice that number in the other House, men richer than many of their colleagues, some of them unwounded and unhurt, not objects of charity, are to be pensioned, so these resolutions say. That is not right. I am advised that under the late arrears of pensions law, there are men who have received six, eight, and ten thousand dollars, some of whom are probably worth millions. I had supposed that the pension law of a country was to provide for men who were needy, for men or their families who were either suffering or who could not well live in comfort without the bounty of the Government being bestowed upon them; and that class of men everybody is willing to provide for, as far as we can; but when you embrace all classes and conditions of men, soldiers of the Mexican war, soldiers of the war of the rebellion, soldiers of the Indian wars, the questions very naturally arise what is the use of it, and where is the money to come from? for they will all finally get arrears.

All must agree that we have a system of tariff taxation now that costs the consumer of the taxed products, for they are the men who pay the taxes, $5 for every $1 that the Treasury receives. Because we have a great surplus it is perhaps thought to be an easy way of keeping up taxation to give the money away to everybody who makes a pretense of a claim that he ever was in the Army. The worst of it is that under the present system every man who can get affidavits made that he was in the Army, and was sick from any ailment like that he now has, can get a pension running back nearly or quite twenty years. I do not propose to be a spy or an informer, but I have a letter before me from one of the best Union officers in the late civil war that I know of, who fought all through it. He tells me that he knows that the frauds are so great in the region of Kentucky where he lives that he is satisfied that the Government is paying at least $250,000 to men in his part of the country who were not entitled to pensions under any fair pretense whatever. I have letters from Ohio and from other States almost as strong against the present system. The managers of the soldiers' homes go so far as to say the arrears of pensions law demoralized nearly all of the inmates; that the men went away, drew their money, and then came back after a period of about six weeks with every sort of disease that a soldier who is reckless or careless may contract. They had to be taken back, and their money has all gone into the hands of sharpers. What I desire is, that the money which we pay for pensions shall go to the needy, and that some provision shall be made by which every man who may have a false affidavit made shall be punished instead of being allowed to draw a pension upon it.

The late Commissioner of Pensions told us how bad the condition was. The late Senator from Virginia, Mr. Withers, while chairman of the Committee on Pensions of this body, told us there were no sort of safeguards now. I hope the Committee on Pensions will bring in some bill that will protect the deserving and at the same time prevent those who are not entitled to pensions from getting them; and I hope when we do make laws and modifications it will not be as a bonus to the wealthy and the men who do not require help out of taxes taken from the labor of the people, but that the pensions will go to those who need the aid of the Government. In the mean time I had hoped that we would before now have a well-guarded bill presented instead of a mere declaratory resolution, which accomplishes nothing so far as I am advised except to embarrass our own action when the time for action comes.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I do not know what Senators or what Representatives the Senator from Kentucky refers to as having been in the Mexican war who are now so rich. I have no knowledge of them. I know some men who were in that war, and who are now in the Senate, who are not rich. But conceding that every member of the Senate and of the House who was in the Mexican war is to-day a millionaire—as rich as Vanderbilt or Jay Gould—I ask what reason is that why the poor, the needy, the crippled, the destitute, the disabled in the Mexican war should be deprived of justice because some of the survivors of that struggle happen to be rich? The reason is too weak to assert in the presence of such a body as the American Senate. The amendment should stand upon its merits, not by taking a special and exceptional case and saying, "Here is one man who is rich, and therefore the six, seven, or eight thousand survivors who are poor should be excluded because one is rich." I trust I never shall indulge in such logic.

Referring to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Texas will suspend the Chair will receive a message from the House of Representatives. The Chair will also suggest to the Senator from Texas that the hour of three o'clock has arrived, at which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] gave notice he would make the announcement of the death of a member of the other House.

Mr. MAXEY. I was not aware of that fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Texas when the pending resolution again comes up. It will remain as the unfinished business of the Senate.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE O'CONNOR.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. JOHN BAILEY, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. MICHAEL P. O'CONNOR, late a member of the House from the State of South Carolina, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. MICHAEL P. O'CONNOR, late a member of this House from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to his memory the officers and members of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the Senate; and that, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. MICHAEL P. O'CONNOR, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended that opportunity may be given for fitting tributes to the memory of the deceased and to his eminent public and private virtues, and that as a further mark of respect the Senate at the conclusion of such remarks shall adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolutions.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the frequent recurrence of these sad occasions in the Congress of the United States, when we are called upon by fitting ceremonies to pay a final tribute to the memories of our brethren who have died from among us, is calculated to remind us with striking significance of the slight tenure we have upon life. But a few days have elapsed since we heard in this Chamber the touching and affectionate tributes to two of the most distinguished and beloved of our number. One the late-lamented Senator from Rhode Island, (General Burnside,) the embodiment of vigorous health, and yet he answered the call of the grim messenger as surely as did the great Wisconsin Senator, (Carpenter,) who languished and suffered and sunk under the wasting hand of disease.

And again to-day, sir, we are confronted with the dismal reality that another of our brethren of the other House is dead.

His reputation and fame was not so wide-spread and national as the two renowned Senators, but the hearts of neither of them, generous as they were, throbbed with more fervid patriotism or warmed with more generous sympathies than did that of my late friend, M. P. O'CONNOR. He loved his country and his friends with unstinted devotion, and in turn received the homage of their undivided confidence and respect.

The overflowing generosity and kindness of his enthusiastic Irish nature secured for him the warmest attachment of his friends, and his ardent devotion to the best interests of his country and the requirements of duty commanded the admiration of all men.

Mr. O'CONNOR was born in the old town of Beaufort, South Carolina, on the 29th September, 1831, and died in Charleston on the 26th day of April, 1881, in the fiftieth year of his age.

He was educated and graduated at Saint John's College, Fordham, New York, and was by profession a lawyer, with his office in the city of Charleston. He represented that city for four terms in the Legislature of South Carolina, from 1858 to 1865, and was elected to the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses from the second Congressional district, and died while a member of the Forty-sixth Congress.

In 1872 Mr. O'CONNOR was a delegate to the national Democratic convention held in the city of Baltimore, and again represented his party in the national convention at Saint Louis in 1876.

He was highly gifted as an orator and public speaker. In the course of the proceedings of the Baltimore convention, he made one of those impassioned bursts of eloquence that electrifies an audience and takes it captive. He lighted a spark that swept through the convention with irresistible enthusiasm, and acquired in this national arena a reputation as a public speaker that had hitherto been local, but none the less duly appreciated by those who were accustomed to hear him. His style of oratory was peculiarly attractive and captivating. With a clear, ringing voice under perfect control, his style was as chaste and classical as the most finished elocutionist, and his flow of language as easy and unhesitating as an unobstructed stream. Equipped with these high qualities, coupled with a ripe scholarship and well-stored mind, he was a ready and effective speaker and only awaited a fitting opportunity in the other branch of the national Legislature to have illustrated his great powers as a parliamentary debater.

In 1876 Mr. O'CONNOR was made president of that ancient order of glorious memories and associations, the Hibernian Society of Irishmen of Charleston. Hear what one of that society says of him, Hon. A. G. Magrath, who was himself a paragon of perfect speech with a brilliant intellect. In presenting the tribute of respect to the late president, at a meeting of the Hibernian Society, May 3, 1881, Judge Magrath said:

The flowers I lay on his grave are not bright and beautiful as he would have gathered, but who could equal his taste or his skill!

* * * * * * *

His heart was as open and cheering as the light of day. His sympathy with his race was attuned to a perfect harmony. Suffering, whatever form it took, was resistless in its appeal; and oppression, however imposing in its force, was confronted by him, who never quailed before it. And when it grew in its proportions and threatened communities, his spirit rose equal to the magnitude of the occasion; and a generous heart inspired the burning words that caused his passionate eloquence to stir the most sluggish to sympathy with him.

No one born in the land of his forefathers more rejoiced in all that was glorious in its past; or in more touching pathos mourned what is sad and depressing in its present fortunes. These walls have echoed his denunciations of its wrongs, and the demand for its rights. But of these there is no record. They were like the flash of the lightning, brilliant, dazzling, startling; not to be forgotten, yet not to be recalled.

But for his own State, his own city, his own home, his own friends, every generous and indignant passion in him was stirred to its deepest depths in the suffering he saw and shared. When in giving expression to his feeling, when the heart and the brain, with intensity that could not be surpassed in their union, rose into the grand diapason of oratory, he stood to champion her cause; no more devoted son could be found within her limits. He spoke as men do whose words ring true to the honest passion which prompts their utterance; and they who speak forget themselves in kinship with those whose wrongs only are remembered.

He occupied a commanding position in that galaxy of distinguished lawyers at the Charleston bar—one of the ablest, I think, in the whole country—and held his own successfully in intellectual contests with the brightest luminaries of his professional brethren. His entry into active political life was attended by one of the most vexatious and bitter contests ever known in the political history of this country, and yet his most unsympathetic political antagonist will concede that throughout the long and trying ordeal he bore himself with becoming moderation and decorum, and with the self-respect and bearing of a dignified gentleman. Upon taking his seat in the Forty-sixth Congress he was assigned to some of the important committees, and devoted himself with unassuming but faithful earnestness to his duties. Watching the interests of his immediate constituency and section with singular fidelity, taking broad, liberal views of all matters presented to Congress for consideration, he never permitted his duty to his State to narrow his views on national questions. Such, Mr. President, is a brief record of his outward public career. It is as honorable as any man's.

He was for many years in the open light of the public gaze, in times of great temptation and excitement, but no whisper ever tainted his character; no breath of suspicion ever impaired the strength of his public life, and no word of reproach was ever uttered against his private worth. He literally "died in harness," discharging his high duty with a fidelity that was as sacred to him as his life, and an ability that reflects lustre upon his name. This, sir, is a feeble, not overdrawn encomium, that I bestow upon a dead friend with sincere regard for his memory.

But there was an inner circle in Mr. O'CONNER'S life: the family, the home, friends, where he was as simple and unselfish in his affections as a guileless child. It is almost forbidden to enter that sacred circle upon a public occasion, but my contribution to these memorial ceremonies, however otherwise imperfect, would be incomplete without allusion to that phase of his life where the undisguised tenderness of a manly heart and unrestrained indulgence in his pure affections dispensed so much happiness and pleasure to those who clung to him with such ardent devotion. That circle is broken forever.

What power can measure the intensity of the anguish that wrung the hearts of those who had been made glad and happy by his generous affections? Certainly no human power. Let us then draw tenderly and reverently the veil of mourning over the sacred mystery, and lay upon his green grave the homage of our unaffected sorrow.

He lies beneath the soil of the State he loved so well and served so faithfully. It was there he wished to be buried and rest forever, where the ceaseless moaning of the stately pine and the rustling breezes through the evergreen magnolia, mingling with the restless murmur of the neighboring waves and sighing winds of his beloved sunny land, might sing his requiem forever in the perfect harmonies of nature's faultless symphonies.

Mr. BAYARD. My personal acquaintance with the worthy gentleman whose death we all deplore was commenced amid the somewhat stormy scenes of a national convention, held in the city of Baltimore, in June, 1872, which he attended as a delegate from the State of South Carolina; and I can well recall the spirited and effective eloquence with which he espoused a course of action in which I did not concur.

He subsequently became a member of the House of Representatives, and friendly personal relations were soon established between us, in the course of which I discerned his active, ardent interest in public affairs, and his usefulness as an able and honorable Representative of his State and country.

He gained early, and never lost, the confidence and esteem of his associates without regard to their party affiliations, and his reputation as a capable and faithful legislator will long survive.

I remember well his friendly and especial interest in the affairs of that peculiarly helpless class of our people, who suffered so severely by the failure of the Freedman's Savings Bank, and the subsequent mismanagement of its assets.

He espoused the cause of that large body of poor investors with characteristic generosity and devotion, and, had his wise counsels prevailed, I believe great deterioration in the assets of that institution and heavy losses would have been prevented.

Mr. O'CONNOR, although a natural born citizen of South Carolina, possessed, in a marked degree, the characteristics of the race from which he sprung. His name and parentage were Irish; and he was one of the almost countless illustrations of worth and character, eloquence and wit, courage and capacity, which that island of sorrow has contributed to build up and strengthen the Government of the United States and the advancement of its people.

Mr. President, if the names of the men of Irish birth and Irish blood who have dignified and decorated the annals of American history were to be erased from the record, how much of the glory of our country would be subtracted! In the list of American statesmen and patriots; theologians and poets; soldiers and sailors; jurists and orators; what names shine with purer lustre, or are mentioned with more respect, than those of the men, past and present, we owe to Ireland?

On that imperishable roll of honor, the Declaration of Independence, we find their names, and in the prolonged struggle that followed, there was no battle-field, from the Saint Lawrence to the Savannah, but was enriched with Irish blood shed in the cause of civil and religious liberty. To-day we see them in our midst, honored and beloved by their associates, and valued, not by their constituents alone, but by the entire country. Of this patriotic class was Mr. O'CONNOR, and whilst we cannot fail to mourn the loss occasioned by his death, we may well cherish the legacy of honest fame and faithful public service he has left us.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, only a few weeks ago the Senate was called upon to express its respect and sympathy over the loss of two of its distinguished members, and it sent its resolutions of mourning to receive the concurrence of the other House. To-day that House, as if to remind us of the undiscriminating harshness of death, and that no official station within or without this Capitol can shield or protect its victims, informs us officially of the loss of one of its members. The worthy man of whom I am to speak to-day was not known to many Senators as well as he was to me. I met him in the first political body I ever entered—the Baltimore convention of 1872; and when he entered the other House my acquaintance ripened into intimacy. In my intercourse with him I had a fair opportunity of studying and appreciating his character, which was eminently distinguished for qualities that always have excited and always will excite both interest and admiration.

MICHAEL P. O'CONNOR was a generous, tender-hearted, brave man. His mind was active, bright, and full of impartiality. And his great heart—how shall I speak of it?—was filled to overflowing with the kindliest and tenderest feelings and sympathies, which needed only the faintest exhibition of sorrow or misfortune to bring them into full play. He was the undoubted possessor of some of the best qualities of that race to which his name exclusively belongs. While he was a native of South Carolina, and was devoted to her as strongly as man ever was to the soil that gave him birth, in all the controlling characteristics of nature he was an Irishman—more of an Irishman than many who first saw the light of heaven on Irish soil; and there was not the least dross in his character to obscure or disfigure those genuine traits of the race from which he sprung.

While no one claimed for him those pre-eminent gifts of mind which immortalized Sheridan, Grattan, and Curran, still he had qualities in common with all of those great men, and without which their purely intellectual gifts never would have made them famous as orators and thinkers. The inflamed fancy, the enthusiastic spirit, the emotional nature were all his, and with them he combined a lofty, indeed I might say an ever watchful and sensitive, courage, which was ever on tip-toe surveying everything that approached the sacred domain of his manhood and honor. The slightest imputation or insinuation of indignity would arouse all the stormy fury of his nature, while the simplest appeal to his charity and kindness would melt him into the tenderest sympathy and almost bring forth his tears. Whatever cause or object enlisted his exertions received from him the most persevering support, and he gave in such cases to the interests and concerns of the stranger more labor and effort than he would ever give to his own.

His was one of those noble souls which, instead of leaving the great highway of suffering and sorrow to avoid the appeals of the injured and distressed, are forever in search of objects upon which to exercise their benevolence and kindness. The sufferings and wrongs of the country of his fathers affected him as deeply as they did any one who had personally felt their sting. He was familiar with her sad history of tears and blood. Never weak enough to deny her claim to the sympathy of the world, or because of her poverty and oppression refused her the honor and recognition that was due to her genius and her fame. Whenever a kind or sympathetic word was called for in the interest of Ireland, the voice of M. P. O'CONNOR was always heard. While he might have skulked behind his nativity and disclaimed his Irish blood, he was too great, and good, and true to be either insincere or indifferent in anything, and his justice and intelligence were too strong and decided for him ever to think of any petty advantage which might flow from giving those who gave the cold shoulder to the land of his fathers. The admonition of Ireland's great past had no effect upon him.

> Unprized are her sons till they learn to betray,
> Undistinguished they live if they shame not their sins,
> And the torch that would light them to dignity's way
> Must be caught from the pile when their country expires.

In his character of a national legislator he combined the most untiring devotion to the interests of his immediate constituents with a sincere and active interest for the welfare and happiness of the whole Union. Accepting with manly resignation the inevitable results of the civil war he brought to the councils of his country a mind and heart free from all unkindness and prejudice as well as an honest determination to employ his best talents in promoting concord and good-will among all classes of the people. Often have I been benefited by the breadth and patriotism of his views respecting the duties of those who represented southern constituencies in Congress. He spoke with the wisdom of a philosopher and in the words of a true patriot.

He was not unmindful of the natural effects of the terrible civil conflict through which we had passed in obstructing for a time the extension of justice and kindness to the section he so dearly loved. He made due allowance for the passions and weaknesses of human nature, and what others attributed to inborn and irremediable hostility he knew to be only the excrescence of protracted sectional strife, which, if not inflamed for unworthy purposes by weak or designing men, would ultimately yield to the healthy reaction of the body-politic, and leave the country in the enjoyment of real peace, union, and concord.

I have seen him surrounded by his devoted family, and any one in the least conversant with the operations of his private life could readily see that to his high qualities as a citizen and public servant he added the virtues of a devoted husband and an affectionate father. I have sometimes heard public men applauded for their Christian faith. With Mr. O'CONNOR religion was not an empty name. He did not aim to be a pillar of the church, and never attempted to put his piety into the faces of those with whom he mingled. Like all true men he eliminated it from all else that appertained to the affairs of this life, and regarded it as a sacred thing in which only himself and his God were concerned. Devoid of all sectarian narrowness and bigotry, his preference for the creed in which he lived and died never for a moment interrupted the course of his friendship and love for those who differed with him. Although cut down in the prime of his manhood he lived long enough to establish a character for honor, usefulness, and devotion to duty of which both his family and people may be proud.

> Oh, my beloved and devoted friend,
> While kindred woes still breathe around thine urn,
> Long with the tear of absence must I blend
> The sigh that speaks, Thou never shalt return.
> 'Twas faith that, bending o'er the bed of death,
> Shed o'er thy pallid cheek a transient ray;
> With softer effort soothed thy labering breath,
> Gave grace to anguish, beauty to decay.
> Thy wife and children claimed thy latest care;
> Theirs was the last that to thy bosom clung;
> For them to Heaven thou send'st the expiring prayer,
> The last that faltered on thy trembling tongue.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, twice within the past few days have we been called upon to do honor to the memory of colleagues who have been summoned to answer that great final roll-call on high, to which all mankind must respond. Laying aside the ordinary routine of business; pausing for a time amid the rush of active life and the clash of conflicting opinions; forgetting even all political differences, we met, on those solemn occasions, on the broad ground of a common humanity, consecrated to us by a common affliction. Rhode Island and Wisconsin, mourning the death of two illustrious citizens who had represented them in this Chamber, called then upon the great sisterhood of States for that sympathy which sorrow such as theirs demands, and which should always be freely given. We all know how generously, how tenderly this was extended. To-day South Carolina, deploring the loss of a gifted and devoted son, turns in her bereavement to her sister States for the same sympathy.

The resolutions which have been presented by my colleague tell of the death of Hon. M. P. O'CONNOR, late a Representative from my State in the other branch of Congress, and the touching tributes which have been paid to his memory leave me nothing to say that could add to the high and deserved estimation in which he was held. Feeling this I should remain silent were it not that as a representative on this floor of the State which honored him and which he loved so ardently, it becomes me to bear testimony to his signal public services and to his eminent private virtues. As a Senator from South Carolina it is my duty to do this, but a much higher duty, one very near my heart, demands this at my hands. He was a valued and trusted friend. The warm friendship I entertained for him sprang up in long by-gone years; it grew stronger as time rolled on, and it was terminated only by his death. I feel his loss, therefore, not only as a public calamity but as a severe personal bereavement. Few men in our State had a wider circle of earnest, devoted friends than himself, and I know of no tribute to him which could be more honorable, more touching, or more tender than the general sense of personal loss felt at his death by all of them. Warm-hearted, generous, kind, and lovable, he drew his friends close to him, and they loved him for his virtues while they admired him for his talents.

He was no ordinary man either in character or intellect, for while the one secured for him the esteem of those who knew him, the other won for him a wide and well-earned reputation. The warm Irish blood that flowed in his veins gave to his nature its impulsive generosity and lent to his persuasive tongue no small portion of that marvelous eloquence which seems to be the birthright of the countrymen of Burke, of Sheridan, of Curran, of Grattan, and of O'Connell. But with all these rare gifts of nature, of intellect, and of education, he was not fitted for the rough conflict of political strife, and I have no doubt his life was cut short by the anxieties, the responsibilities, and the vexations attending a public career. He was so conscientious in the discharge of all his duties, so laborious in the performance of them, so sensitive in his nature that his health gave way under the severe strain to which it was subjected by his public duties. Broken in health, bravely struggling to the last in the interest of the people who had honored him, he fell at his post of duty with his harness on, and his last, his dying efforts were given to the State he had served well, and to the people who loved and trusted him. His death was a severe loss to that State, an irreparable one to his family, but a gain to him, for he had so lived that he was well prepared to give an account of the deeds done in the flesh. He lived long enough to achieve an honorable, enviable reputation, and long enough to realize that—

The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

When he was laid at rest in the bosom of his mother earth, under the shadows of the magnolias of his native land, a friend who knew him well wrote thus of him:

For him who lies in peace with restful hands this morning, it had been better perhaps had he never known the vicissitudes and responsibilities of political life. It was all loss to him. The gain was to his people and the State. So must it be too often in such times as these with men most worthy of public trust.

Doubtless, Mr. President, it would have been better for him had he held aloof from the rude arena of political warfare, keeping the even tenor of his way along the quieter and happier paths of private life; but we who are left are better for the example of his life and that of his death. The one shows us the duty of the patriot, the other teaches the sublime faith of the Christian. They both should impress on us the great lesson that—

'Tis not the whole of life to live,
Nor all of death to die.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously; and (at three o'clock and twenty-nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 9, 1882.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DISTRICT MUNICIPAL CODE.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I offer for adoption, by unanimous consent, at this time, the resolution which I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be evening sessions of this House on Tuesdays and Thursdays of each week, commencing on Thursday, the 16th instant, to be devoted to the consideration of House bill 1295, to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia, and shall continue until the consideration of such bill is concluded. And upon the said days the House shall take a recess until 7½ o'clock p. m.

Mr. NEAL. This is a bill of 325 pages of print, and a very important measure, which ought to receive consideration by the House as soon as possible, and I hope there will be no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON. I should like to know how many evening sessions the gentleman from Ohio thinks it will take.

Mr. NEAL. It will take three or four, probably not over three.

Mr. ANDERSON. Would the gentleman have any objection to limiting the effect of the resolution to ten evening sessions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to ask a parliamentary question before I consent, and it is this: Does this resolution take that bill off the House Calendar?

Mr. NEAL. It will be laid aside from the House Calendar, as a matter of course.

Mr. PAGE. Very well, with the understanding when we reach the House Calendar that bill will be laid aside to be considered during the evening sessions referred to, I will not object.

Mr. NEAL. That is it. This bill passed the House at the last session, and I do not think it will take more than three or four evening sessions to dispose of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be considered as unanimously adopted.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Accounts, reported back, as a substitute for House joint resolution No. 119, joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees of the House shall begin; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the pay of clerks to committees of the House of Representatives, authorized by the House, who are paid during the session only, shall begin from the time said clerks entered upon the discharge of their duties to committees, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of the several committees employing clerks for the session only.

Mr. MARTIN. I imagine, Mr. Speaker, nobody wants any further explanation. Its object is apparent from the reading of the resolution.

Mr. PAGE. No, that is sufficient; let us have a vote.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MARTIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PACKING, ETC., AGRICULTURAL SPECIMENS.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 2796) to appropriate $5,000 for packing, transporting, and arranging certain agricultural and mineral specimens be taken from the Speaker's table for the purpose of concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment of the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 10, after "exhibitors," insert as follows:
"And to pay any necessary expense already incurred for that purpose."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. VALENTINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. CAMP, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4205) dividing the State of New York into judicial districts, and fixing the time of holding courts therein; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4206) to fix the day for the meeting of the electors of President and Vice-President, and to provide for and regulate the counting of the votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Law Respecting Election of President and Vice-President, and ordered to be printed.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT, ETC.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4207) to carry into effect the provisions of the Constitution respecting the election of President and Vice-President of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Law Respecting Election of President and Vice-President, and ordered to be printed.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS.

Mr. COBB. I am directed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report back, as a privileged question, the following resolution, and to move its adoption:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the House at his earliest convenience the names of all railroad companies to which the Government has granted lands to aid in the construction of their railroads, and the names of all States and railroad companies where grants of public lands have been made by the Government to said States for the benefit of said railroad companies in the construction of their railroads which have not completed their said roads within the time provided by law, the amount of land embraced in each grant, and the amount disposed of by each of said railroad companies and States, and the dates of all acts of Congress relating to each of said grants, and the number of miles of each of said railroads completed under and pursuant to the acts making such grants, as well as the number of miles of each remaining uncompleted at the date at which said acts required the completion of the same. And he is also requested to give the name of each of said railroad companies and States which are required by law to reimburse the Government for moneys expended by it in the surveying, selecting, or conveying said lands comprised within each of their said grants, and also what amount, if any, is now due from each of said companies and States by way of reimbursement for the cost of said surveying, selecting, and conveying said lands, stating the amount in full, by debit and credit, on said indebtedness.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask if that is reported from a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is reported by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. COBB. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. KASSON. I simply asked the question for the reason that almost every morning we have something of the kind presented here; and I desired that the committee should report a general resolution upon the subject.

Mr. COBB. I think the gentleman from Iowa is mistaken. This is the only resolution of the kind which has yet come before the House.

Mr. KASSON. I have heard several resolutions of a similar character presented and referred to different committees, some to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and to other committees. I have no objection to the resolution myself, but, as I have stated, I think a general resolution might be adopted upon the subject.

Mr. COBB. I am satisfied the gentleman will find that there has not been such a resolution presented to the House before.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. CHARLES B. STEWART.

Mr. WADSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4208) for the relief of Mrs. Charles B. Stewart; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FREEDMAN'S BANK BUILDING, WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUCKNER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 1092, with a view to putting it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. No. 1092) authorizing and directing the purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the public use, the property known as the Freedman's Bank, and the real estate and parcels of ground adjacent thereto, belonging to the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and located on Pennsylvania avenue, between Fifteenth and Fifteenth-and-a-half streets, Washington, District of Columbia.

Mr. HOLMAN. That had better take the regular course.

Mr. BUCKNER. This bill, or an exact copy of it, has been passed upon by two committees of the House, the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who unanimously agreed to report a bill of a similar character, an exact copy of this bill, to the House. I think there can be no objection to the immediate consideration of this bill, under the circumstances.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must object to its present consideration; let it take the regular course.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT OWENSBOROUGH, KENTUCKY.

Mr. McKENZIE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4209) establishing a term of the United States circuit and district courts at Owensborough, in the district of Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise to make a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the following resolution, to report the same back to the House and recommend its passage.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, a full and detailed statement of all the items of expenditure for the support of the United States Signal Service which are made out of the annual appropriations for the support of the Army of the United States from the year 1875 to the year 1881, inclusive, and also to state how and by whom all the accounts of the United States Signal Service are audited.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. No. 699) for the relief of Theophilus P. Chandler; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HILL until Wednesday next; to Mr. HARDENBERGH until Monday next; and to Mr. BUTTERWORTH until Monday next, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

REFUND OF CERTAIN DUTIES.

Mr. MORRISON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 176) to refund certain duties paid upon military uniforms imported by and for use of Company G, Sixth Regiment of Infantry Illinois National Guard; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BRANNIN, SUMMERS & CO.

Mr. MORRISON also, from the same committee, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 522) for the relief of Brannin, Summers & Co.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. BUCKNER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3326) for the relief of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BREVET MAJOR-GENERAL MONTGOMERY C. MEIGS.

Mr. McCOOK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 3875) to provide for the retirement of Brevet Major-General Montgomery C. Meigs with the rank according to which he is now assigned to duty; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HERBERT JOYCE.

Mr. McCOOK also, from the same committee, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1151) for the relief of Herbert Joyce; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS B. STRING.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 2038) for the relief of Thomas B. String; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JABEZ BURCHARD.

Mr. TALBOTT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 2610) for the relief of Jabez Burchard; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BURLINGTON, CEDAR RAPIDS AND NORTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. FARWELL, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 316) to provide for the payment of the amount due to the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern Railway Company for transportation of United States mails; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHICAGO, BURLINGTON AND QUINCY RAILROAD.

Mr. PEELLE, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 177) to authorize the Postmaster-General to compensate the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company for facilitating the transportation of the overland mails under agreement; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

TRESPASS, ETC., ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. POUND, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3493) relating to the public lands of the United States, and to require payment of costs in certain cases of trespass or conversion of material therefrom; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SETTLERS ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. POUND also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1934) amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase-money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," approved June 16, 1880; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LANDS LOCATED ON MILITARY WARRANTS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 277) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. DWIGHT. I desire permission to present the views of the minority on the bill just reported.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

HENRY GEE.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3578, a bill (H. R. No. 4210) for the relief of Henry Gee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SENECA INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. DEERING, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1078) to authorize the Seneca Nation of Indians, in the State of New York, to grant title to lands for cemetery purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DRUSILLA H. SWANGER.

Mr. DEERING also, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 2324) for the relief of Drusilla H. Swanger; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BYRON H. HARKNESS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 339) for the relief of Byron H. Harkness; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

STREET RAILWAYS, WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BARR, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with adverse recommendations bills of the following titles; and the same were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1296) to incorporate the M Street Cross-Town Railway;

A bill (H. R. No. 1297) to incorporate the Thirteenth Street Railway; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1783) to incorporate the Fifteenth Street Railway.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees has been completed.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I rise to call for the regular order, but am willing to yield to one or two gentlemen for the introduction of bills for reference.

WIDOW OF WILLIAM PERINE.

Mr. WARNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4211) for the relief of the widow and administratrix of William Perine, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN J. H. GILLIS.

Mr. DEZENDORF, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 128) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain J. H. Gillis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD H. MURRELL.

Mr. DEZENDORF also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4212) for the relief of Edward H. Murrell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HANNAH M. WRIGHT.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4213) granting a pension to Hannah M. Wright; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ALFRED LYLES.

Mr. CHAPMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives of the United States to the Sergeant-at-Arms thereof the sum of $200, or as much as may be necessary thereof, to pay the funeral expenses contracted by reason of the sickness and death of Alfred Lyles, late employé of the folding-room of this House. And there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of this House three months' pay to Minnie Lyles, widow of deceased. Both sums appropriated by this resolution shall be subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts. And also that there be paid to his widow, Minnie Lyles, out of the contingent fund of this House $370, arrears of pay which was due her husband, Alfred Lyles, at the time of his death for work done in the Doorkeeper's department, subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 3550) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census. Upon this bill the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COLERICK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COLERICK] to yield to me for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that at the end of his hour the House will take a vote on the question whether it will adopt what is called the modulus method of disposing of fractions.

Mr. PRESCOTT and others objected.

Mr. HAZELTON. Let the debate proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to forty minutes of his hour still remaining.

Mr. COLERICK resumed and concluded the speech begun yesterday. The entire speech is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the subject now under consideration, by reason of its great importance, deserves and demands careful attention, and its discussion and our action thereon should be devoid of and uninfluenced by passion or partisan feeling. We must deal fairly with all sections of the country, and make an apportionment which, by reason of its fairness and justness, will command and receive the commendation of the people. The larger States must not, by reason of their superior strength, combine and unite together, as apprehended, in a common purpose to unjustly augment their power by ignoring the rights and disregarding the interests of the smaller States who are too feeble to successfully defend themselves against such encroachments. A spirit of justice should animate and influence them to deal fairly with their sister States, and not seek to degrade them by unfairly reducing their power. Every noble instinct of the human heart and every sentiment of justice revolts against the consummation of such a wrong—one which would create distrust on the part of the smaller States, and tend to mar that perfect harmony, inspired by a feeling of security and safety, based upon the supposed equality of the States which now exists and so closely cements together all the States as one grand Union.

It is my purpose to confine myself strictly to a discussion of the bill and the amendments thereto which have been submitted to the House by the committee to whom the subject of the apportionment was referred. Two questions are presented and involved in their consideration, one of which relates to the method to be resorted to in making the apportionment, and the other to the number of Representatives to be apportioned.

By referring to the report of the Superintendent of Census, page 39, it will be discovered that if the number of Representatives is fixed at 320, as proposed by the committee, the ratio for a Representative will be 154,285 persons, and that the number of Representatives which can be assigned to the several States, on even division of their population, by that ratio, is 302, leaving 18 remaining to be assigned. According to the method which was first proposed by General Walker, as Superintendent of Census, and which is in harmony with the practice heretofore pursued by Congress, these 18 Representatives should be assigned to those States which have the largest fractions resulting after first assigning to those States on even division the number of Representatives to which they are entitled. Under this method these 18 Representatives should be assigned to the following States: California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, and Virginia, one each, making 16 in all, and the other two to Delaware and Nevada, as they, under the Constitution, are entitled to them, although the populations of those States are less than the ratio adopted in making distribution of Representatives.

But a majority of the committee, acting upon the suggestion of Mr. Seaton, who was the chief clerk and is now the Superintendent of Census, ignore the old method, or reject it as inequitable, and adopt a new one by which the larger States are to be augmented in power at the sacrifice of the smaller ones. Under this new method, by which large States absorb small ones, the eighteen Representatives are assigned as follows: New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, two each; Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, Ohio, Tennessee, and Virginia, one each, and the other two are assigned to Delaware and Nevada. The result of changing the old method for the new is that California is robbed of one of her Representatives for the benefit of Pennsylvania, in the interest of a high protective tariff; Florida is robbed of one of her Representatives for the benefit of New York, in the interest of the national banking system and the perpetuation of the public debt; and Rhode Island is robbed of one of her Representatives for the benefit of Illinois, to appease the wrath and conciliate the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SHERWIN,] who is a member of the committee that reported this bill, and who, had he not been reconciled by increasing on his demand the representation of Illinois at the expense of little Rhode Island, would have opposed the passage of this bill, and advocated one in harmony with the views expressed by him in the able speech which he delivered in the Forty-sixth Congress, when he, with great power and eloquence, contended for an apportionment based upon principles of fairness, justice, and equality, none of which elements enter into the composition of this bill.

Let us for a few moments more closely examine the results flowing from the application of this new method. By recurring to the report of the Superintendent of Census, we ascertain that after assigning to Rhode Island the Representative to which she is entitled on even division by the ratio adopted, she has a fraction remaining, consisting of 121,762 persons, for which she is allowed no Representative, while Pennsylvania for her fraction of 117,196, being 4,566 less than that of Rhode Island, is allowed 2 Representatives; Florida for her fraction of 115,208 is assigned no Representative, while New York for her fraction of 145,751, being only 30,543 in excess of that of Florida, is allowed 2 Representatives, which is equal to 1 Representative for a fraction of 72,875. Combining the fractions of New York and Pennsylvania they aggregate 262,947, for which these two States receive 4 Representatives, being equal to 1 Representative for every 65,722 persons, while Rhode Island and Florida for their fractions, aggregating 236,970, and being only 25,977 less than those of New York and Pennsylvania, are not allowed a single Representative. California has a fraction of 93,269, for which she receives no Representative, while Massachusetts for her fraction of 85,950, being 7,319 less than that of California, has 1 Representative assigned to her; and Iowa for her fraction of 81,765, being 11,504 less than that of California, receives 1 Representative, and New York with a fraction only 23,927 greater than that of California, obtains for her fraction 2 Representatives; Illinois for her fraction of 146,456 receives 2 Representatives, being 1 for each 73,152 persons, while Indiana for her fraction of 126,881, being only 19,575 less than that of Illinois, obtains but 1 Representative; Tennessee for her fraction of 153,794 is allowed but 1 Representative, while Pennsylvania for her fraction, which is 36,598 less than that of Tennessee, is assigned 2 Representatives, and New York for her fraction, which is 8,043 less than that of Tennessee, obtains 2 Representatives, and Illinois for a fraction of 7,338 less than that of Tennessee, receives 2 Representatives; Virginia for her fraction of 124,000, being 6,804 greater than that of Pennsylvania, is allowed but 1 Representative.

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in his splendid speech upon this subject in the Forty-sixth Congress, which will perpetuate his name and fame, indulged in the highest praise of General Walker, and cordially indorsed and zealously advocated, with matchless power and ability, the method then proposed by General Walker for the distribution of the Representatives remaining after an even division, which was to assign them to the States having the largest fractions, but suddenly, for reasons that are apparent, he becomes enamored with the new method, and ignominiously rejects the old time-honored one and enters the field as a devout and zealous champion of the "new departure." His marvelous conversion is clearly explained by examining the amendment which he has offered, by which he fixes 307 as the number of Representatives to be assigned, the ratio being 1 for every 160,819 persons, and after distributing among the States the number to which they are entitled on even division, 18 Representatives remain to be assigned. By distributing them according to the old method, they would be assigned as follows: Alabama, Arkansas, Connecticut, Florida, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Nebraska, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Texas, and West Virginia, 1 each, and the other 2 to Delaware and Nevada. But the distinguished gentleman, [Mr. COX,] rejecting this method and adopting the new, takes from Florida, Rhode Island, and Nebraska the 3 Representatives to which they are entitled for their fractions and gives them to three other States, New York being one of those States.

A few comparisons will satisfy any intelligent and impartial mind that the amendment proposed by him is, if possible, more unfair and unjust than the bill reported by the committee, and is evidently offered in the interest of New York alone. By this amendment the State of New York for her fraction of 97,482 receives 2 Representatives, being equal to 1 Representative for each 48,741 of her fraction while Florida, for her fraction of 108,674, being 11,192 greater than that of New York, receives no Representative, nor does Rhode Island for her fraction of 115,712, being 18,230 greater than that of New York. Pennsylvania for her fraction of 101,597 receives a Representative, while neither Florida nor Rhode Island for larger fractions receive one, (a Representative,) but, on the contrary, each of those States is most unjustly deprived of one of their present Representatives. Under this amendment New York, for her fraction of 97,482, receives 2 Representatives, while Arkansas for her fraction of 159,767, being 67,767 larger than that of New York, only obtains 1 Representative, and Texas for her fraction of 144,378, being 46,896 greater than that of New York, receives only 1 Representative, and Nebraska for her fraction of 130,764, being 33,282 greater than that of New York, receives but 1 Representative, and California for her fraction of 60,599, being only 33,883 less than that of New York, receives no Representative.

I will not weary the House by pointing out all of the glaring acts of injustice that are sought to be consummated in the apportionment as proposed by the majority of the committee by the bill which they have reported, or by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] by the amendment which he has proposed. I have merely made these few comparisons as illustrations to demonstrate how an adroit mathematician like Mr. Seaton can, by skillfully arranged computations and tables, produce the grossest wrongs and inflict the severest injuries to States that can possibly occur, in unjustly reducing their power in this House in the interest of other States.

Can any gentleman upon this floor, after carefully examining the results produced in adopting and applying this new method, so ingeniously devised for the absorption of the power of small States by larger ones, truthfully declare that, in his honest judgment, an apportionment based upon such method, is fair, equitable, and just, and in harmony with either the letter or spirit of the Constitution, which declares that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers?" (Fourteenth amendment, section 2.)

One of the most singular features distinguishing the two methods is forcibly presented by the comparisons to which I have directed your attention, and which furnishes, to my mind, the most convincing and conclusive proof of the fallacy and injustice of the so-called new method. It is this: by the old method the Representatives remaining after assigning to the different States the number to which they are entitled on even division are awarded to the States having the largest fractions remaining, while under the new method they are assigned regardless of the size of the fractions. The result in adopting the new method is, that certain States will receive two Representatives each for fractions greatly less than the ratio allowed for a single Representative. This is notably true in selecting 320 as the number of Representatives to be assigned. By selecting that number, and distributing them in accordance with the new method, the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, for their several fractions, which are much less than the ratio required for a single Representative, will each receive two Representatives, which shows, as to those States, that it is an advantage to them to have small fractions, as they enhance and increase the representation of those States beyond the number to which they would be entitled if their population was much greater.

Take, for illustration, the State of New York. If the number of Representatives to be assigned is fixed at 307, as proposed by the gentleman from that State, [Mr. COX,] the ratio will be 160,819, which will entitle that State, on even division, to 31 Representatives, and leave a fraction of 97,482, being 63,337 less than the ratio required for a Representative, and yet, for this fraction, she receives, under the new method, 2 Representatives. Is this fair or just? Why, sir, to entitle a State to 2 Representatives on even division, by the ratio named, it must have a population of 321,638, but the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] by his amendment based upon the new method, gives to his own State 2 Representatives for her fraction of 97,482, which is 224,156 less than the number required to give her that number of Representatives on even division. If we add 63,337 to the present population of New York this increase combined with her fraction of 97,482 would just be sufficient to entitle her, on even division, to 32 Representatives. But as New York is blessed, according to the new method, with a smaller population, her representation for that reason is increased to 33. She gains thereby 1 Representative as a reward for her diminished population. No wonder that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] repudiates the old method and adopts the new. So if the number of Representatives to be assigned is fixed at 320, the ratio required for a Representative is 154,285, but New York for her fraction, which is much less than the ratio required for a single Representative, receives 2.

The same inequality and injustice to other States occurs in the case of Pennsylvania, fixing the number of Representatives at 320. She would, on even division, receive 27, and have a fraction remaining of 117,196, being 37,089 less that the ratio required for a Representative; and yet, under the new method, she received for her fraction 2 Representatives. In other and plainer words, if Pennsylvania possessed a population of 37,089 larger than she actually has she would only be entitled to 28 Representatives; but under the novel, unjust, and absurd plan devised by Mr. Seaton she receives 29 Representatives, which demonstrates that a larger population would be a detriment to her. She is awarded a premium for her impotency, while Florida, for increasing so greatly in population, is degraded, yea, robbed of a Representative for the benefit of Pennsylvania, and we are asked to approve and sanction by our votes this great wrong. For one I will never consent to do so.

The tables prepared by Mr. Seaton are very deceptive, and require the closest and most careful inspection. After urging with great plausibility the propriety of making the population of Congressional districts approximate as closely as possible in population to the ratio fixed for a Representative, he, in the final results which he produces in the assignment of Representatives, clearly demonstrates the fallacy of his method and the injustice that would flow from its application. Aye, Mr. Speaker, more than that, he, in his partiality for the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, ignores his own method, and assigns to them more Representatives than they are entitled to under that method. I ask your indulgence and attention for a few moments until I prove the truth of my assertion. By consulting the table on page 44 of the report of the Superintendent we find that according to his own method the State of New York is only entitled to 33 Representatives, instead of 34, the number which he assigns to her. Dividing the population of New York by 33, the number of Representatives to which she is entitled under that method, the size of the districts will be 154,026, being only 59 less than the ratio required for a Representative, and by assigning to her 33 Representatives she will then receive representation for 8,547 more persons than the State contains; but Mr. Seaton, in his great and very peculiar liberality toward that State and in utter disregard of his own method, allows her 34 Representatives, and thereby New York not only obtains a Representative for her fraction, but also obtains an additional Representative for a district without constituents to be represented in this body. What a delightful thing it will be to represent it! By allowing New York 34 Representatives, as proposed by the committee, the size of the districts will be 149,496, being 4,783 less than the ratio required for a Representative, or 162,826 less than the number required to entitle her to 34 Representatives by the ratio adopted, and thereby allowing her representation for 162,826 more persons than reside in the State, while Florida is denied representation for 115,208 persons actually possessed by her. It may be pertinent in this connection to inquire where the discoverer of this new method hails from. The Official Register advises us that he is a resident of the State of New York. Further comment as to the motive which conceived and gave birth to the new method, of which he is the father, is unnecessary.

It also appears by the same table that Pennsylvania, according to the new method, is only entitled to 28 Representatives, and yet, pretending to pursue that method, he, in violation of it, and without explanation, arbitrarily increases the representation of that State to 30. If you divide the population of Pennsylvania by 28, the number of Representatives to which she is entitled under the new method, the size of the districts will be 152,460, being only 1,325 less than the ratio required for a Representative, and by giving her 28 Representatives she will receive representation for 37,100 more persons than the State contains. Then why do the committee, acting upon the suggestion of Mr. Seaton, assign to that State 29 Representatives, making the size of the districts 6,600 less than the ratio required for a Representative, and thereby give to that State representation for 191,400 more persons than her entire population, and only allow California 5 Representatives, making the size of her districts 172,938, being 18,653 greater than the ratio required for a Representative, and producing in her five districts a surplus of 93,265 persons, for which she is denied representation?

And it also appears that for some unexplained reason Illinois is to receive 21 Representatives, when under the new method she is only entitled to 20, as will be seen on an examination of the table to which I have referred, which shows that by dividing the population of that State by 20, the number to which she is entitled according to the new method, the size of the districts will be 153,893, only 392 less than the required ratio, and by allowing her 20 Representatives she will receive representation for 7,840 more persons than live in the State. But the committee propose to allow her, in disregard of the method resorted to, 21 Representatives, making the size of the districts 7,720 less than the ratio required for a Representative, and thereby granting her representation for 162,826 more persons than the State contains, and at the same time, professing to act under the same method, deprive Rhode Island of representation for 122,246 persons which she possesses. Other comparisons might be made with equal force to demonstrate the gross inequality and unfairness that would result in adopting the new method; but as "comparisons are odious" I will desist from doing so.

Mr. Speaker, we ought not to do injustice to California, Florida, and Rhode Island to satisfy the inordinate greed of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois for increased power. If you examine the census reports you will find that the population of California in 1870 was 560,247, while in 1880 it was 864,686, being an increase of 54.34 per cent.; that the population of Florida in 1870 was 187,748, while in 1880 it was 267,351, being an increase of 42.39 per cent.; and that of Rhode Island in 1870 was 217,353, while in 1880 it was 276,528, being an increase of 27.22 per cent. Have the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, for whose benefit the wrong is to be inflicted, kept even pace with them in growth during that time? Oh, no. The census returns show that the increase in population of the State of New York was only 15.99 per cent., that of Pennsylvania only 21.60 per cent., and that of Illinois only 21.21 per cent., which shows that the three smaller States are increasing in population more rapidly than the three larger ones. May we not, in view of their marvelous growth, safely predict that the increase in population of California and Florida, to which the stream of emigration is constantly flowing with greater power every day, will at the end of the next decennial period more than surpass the gains for the one that has just closed? They are both young and growing States, possessing attractions which assure to them a bright and promising future, and in fixing the apportionment which is to continue for ten years we must take into consideration the rapid and continuous development and growth of those States.

Mr. Seaton, the alleged patentee of the new method, for the purpose of aiding him in producing the beautiful harmony, pleasing symmetry, and exact precision which, he says, characterizes it, with an unbounded generosity, equaled only by that of the lamented Artemus Ward, who, during the recent war, in a moment of fervent patriotism and devout love of country, expressed his willingness to sacrifice on the battle-field for the restoration of the Union and the preservation of the Constitution all of his able-bodied relations, proposes to supply New York's quota of persons required to entitle her to 34 Representatives by drafting into her service 115,208 people of the State of Florida over their earnest and solemn protest. Why, sir, ten years ago Florida, with a population 79,693 less than she now has, was assigned two Representatives; and now, with an increased population, equaling 42.39 per cent., and in the presence of facts which unerringly indicate that her onward march will be unobstructed, it is seriously proposed to deprive her of one of her Representatives. We all know that it would be an act of great injustice to do so, and I hope that it may not meet the approval of this body.

Mr. Speaker, in fixing the number of Representatives to be apportioned among the States we ought to select that number which, when apportioned, will afford the largest representation of the people; that is, which will leave the smallest fraction or fewest people unrepresented. We all understand that the ratio of representation is ascertained by dividing the entire number of persons in all the States by the number of Representatives to be assigned, and when the ratio is so obtained the number of Representatives to which each State will be entitled under that ratio is determined by dividing the figures representing the population of the State by those representing the ratio, which division will invariably result in leaving a fraction. As the successive divisions of the population of the different States will not produce the entire number of Representatives to be assigned, the additional ones required to complete the number are, under the old method, obtained by assigning them to those States which have the largest fractions, so that the smaller fractions will indicate the number of people who will be unrepresented, and these fractions, which will be produced regardless of the ratio that may be adopted, will aggregate a vast number. Hence the importance of mitigating as far as possible the wrong in depriving people of representation. It can only be mitigated by selecting that number of Representatives which, when apportioned, will leave the smallest number of people unrepresented. Let us ascertain the number of people or fractions that will be unrepresented under the bill and amendments reported by the committee.

If we fix the number at 307, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] they will amount to 711,966; at 320, as proposed by the majority of the committee, to 906,580; and at 316, as proposed by the substitute which I have offered, to 650,709, all of which will more fully appear in the statement which I hold in my hand and which I will have printed as a part of my remarks. It will be observed that under the bill proposed by the committee the largest number of people will be unrepresented, while under the substitute proposed by me the greatest number will be represented. This, in my judgment, furnishes a potential, if not unanswerable, argument in favor of the substitute offered by me. Sir, if this is "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people," a duty devolves upon us to so apportion their Representatives that the greatest number of the people may be represented.

And now in conclusion let me briefly explain the provisions of the bill which I had the honor to present to the House as a member of the Committee on the Census, and which reflects the views of a minority of that committee, and is proposed as a substitute for the bill reported by the majority of the committee. The second and third sections of both bills are alike. The two bills differ only in the number of Representatives to be assigned and the method of assigning them. The bill which is proposed as a substitute fixes the number of Representatives to be distributed at 316, and their distribution is made in accordance with the old method, as recommended by General Walker, and which has existed for many years, and which received the approval of this House in the Forty-sixth Congress, when an apportionment based upon that method was passed.

You will first naturally inquire why 316 was selected as the number of Representatives to be apportioned. I answer by saying that I am opposed to increasing the size of this House except for one purpose only, and that is to preserve, as far as practicable, the present representation of the different States, and this is accomplished by the bill which I have offered.

I have adopted the old method of distributing Representatives, because, in my judgment, it is not only more equitable and fair than the other, and has received the approval of this House, but also, and mainly, because it is in strict harmony with the provisions of the Constitution prescribing the mode of assigning Representatives.

Accepting, as I did, the old method as the proper one to be applied, I found that under that method no number of Representatives less than 316 could be selected which would preserve the representation of the State of New York, and that the selection of that number would preserve the present representation of every State in the Union excepting Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire, and that their present representation could not be preserved without going beyond 350, and that any proposition to enlarge the House to that extent would meet with disfavor, as the sentiment of this body appears to be radically opposed to so large an increase, and therefore I selected that number. When we go beyond that number the additional Representatives obtained thereby, when assigned, will merely augment and increase the present representation of States, and no sufficient reason can be assigned for doing so. It is generally believed, and accepted as true, that this House, with its present number of members, is too large and unwieldy to properly transact required legislation with promptness and satisfaction, and it results in retarding and obstructing legislation instead of facilitating it. While this is true, yet we know that the States constituting the Union are jealous of their power, and with commendable pride will strenuously and justly resist any effort that may be made to reduce their power or lessen their voice in this House, as they naturally and reasonably feel and know that a reduction in their representation will necessarily diminish their influence and impair their power to secure legislation in which they may be interested, and to defeat that which may be prejudicial to their interests.

It will be observed that if the bill reported by the committee is passed the present representation of Maine, New Hampshire, Florida, Vermont, and Rhode Island will be reduced, and California will be deprived of a Representative to which she is justly entitled; and that if the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York

[Mr. COX] is adopted, not only the States which I have named will be reduced in their representation, and California lose the Representative to which she is entitled, but the State of Indiana will also be reduced in her representation. While he is extremely careful to preserve the representation of his own State, he, without remorse or penitence, cruelly and ruthlessly reduces the representation of other States, and it is natural that the Representatives from those States should vigorously and relentlessly oppose and resist the adoption of his amendment. I feel convinced that no member from Indiana on this floor could justify himself before the people of his State in voting in favor of this amendment, as he would thereby assist in degrading his own State by reducing its representation in this House so as to preserve that of New York. Under the substitute which I have offered, all of these States, except Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire, will preserve their present representation, and each State will obtain every Representative to which it is justly entitled, and they are so distributed that a greater number of people will be represented than under the bill reported by the committee or the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

There is neither propriety nor necessity for extending the number beyond 316; every extension beyond that number can only be justified as an act of favor to the States that will be benefited thereby, and not granted as an act of justice to preserve their representation. If you grant such favor to one State other States may and will, with equal propriety and justice, ask and receive similar favors, and when you enter such an uncertain sea no one can predict to what point we will finally drift. It will not do. We must fix the limit somewhere, and why not establish it at 316? Sufficient reasons exist for increasing the membership to that number, but none can be assigned for extending it beyond. When the limit is thus fixed no State, with propriety, can justly ask us to go beyond that limit. For these reasons I submit that the bill offered by me as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee should be passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1024) for the relief of Sidney P. Luther; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1670) for the relief of E. J. Gurley.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 50) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of certain lands adjacent to the town of Pendleton, in the State of Oregon, belonging to the Umatilla Indian reservation, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 51) for the relief of F. G. Schwatka and wife;

A bill (S. No. 63) for the relief of John J. Key and W. G. M. Davis;

A bill (S. No. 242) for the relief of S. Rosenfeld & Co.;

A bill (S. No. 266) for the relief of George W. Weeks & Co., of Louisville, Ky.;

A bill (S. No. 271) for the relief of Frank D. Yates and others;

A bill (S. No. 491) for the relief of Henry P. Rolfe;

A bill (S. No. 494) directing the issue of a duplicate check to William J. Anthony, a pensioner of the United States;

A bill (S. No. 610) for the relief of Hiram I. S. Town, postmaster of the city of Ripon, in the county of Fond du Lac, in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (S. No. 740) to extend the provisions of sections 2990 to 2998, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the ports of Kansas City and Saint Joseph, Missouri.

A bill (S. No. 768) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the Crow Indians of Montana, for the sale of a portion of their reservation in said Territory, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriation for carrying out the same;

A bill (S. No. 788) granting a pension to Olive Stephenson;

A bill (S. No. 892) for the relief of Warren Hall; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the ground south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House resumed the consideration of the apportionment bill.

Mr. COLERICK. How much of my time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALDRICH.) The gentleman has five minutes of his hour left.

Mr. COLERICK. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. DAVIDSON.]

Mr. DAVIDSON. I thank the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COLERICK,] and will avail myself of his kindness to submit a few remarks on the subject before the House, even though I may have to reiterate some things that have already been said.

I feel, as it is natural that I should, the profoundest interest in the bill now under consideration, for should it become a law in the form reported by the committee, my State would be deprived of half of its representation on this floor. If this deprivation should result from the passage by Congress of a fair and equitable apportionment bill, I could not properly complain, however deeply I might regret it. But the bill reported is not fair and equitable. On the contrary, it is unfair and unjust. It proposes not to increase the representation of a State rapidly growing in population and in all the elements of prosperity, but to reduce it. Since March, 1873, Florida has been entitled to two Representatives in this House. This bill gives to her but one, and yet during the last ten years Florida has increased in population nearly 44 per cent., being a larger increase than that of any other State east of the Mississippi River.

This new method, as it is called, and new it is, indeed, so changes the bill which passed the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress that the States of California, Rhode Island, and Florida each lose one Representative, and the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois each gain one. These great States are increased in representation at the expense of the smaller ones named.

This bill also changes the method which has been pursued by Congress in the apportionment of representation for forty years. Heretofore the plan has been, as the members of this House are aware, to determine first what the number of Representatives shall be, then divide the whole population of the States by that number, and the quotient resulting will be the ratio, or the modulus as Mr. Seaton calls it. Then divide the populations of the States respectively by this ratio, and the aggregate of the different quotients thus obtained will be the minimum number of all the Representatives. This minimum number will be less than the number of members or Representatives originally determined upon, and to make up this difference additional Representatives are assigned or given to those States having the largest fractions.

Mr. Speaker, fractions of the ratio have been recognized in apportionment bills for the last four decades, and rightly recognized. Following that plan now, with a House of 320 members the ratio would be 154,285.

Dividing the population of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, California, Rhode Island, and Florida, respectively, by this ratio, we find that New York, with a population of 5,082,871, would be entitled to 32 members, leaving a fraction of 148,761; Pennsylvania, with a population of 4,282,891, would be entitled to 27 members, leaving a fraction of 117,196; Illinois, with a population of 3,077,871, would be entitled to 19 members, leaving a fraction of 146,456; California, with a population of 864,694, would be entitled to 5 Representatives, leaving a fraction of 93,269; Rhode Island, with a population of 276,571, would be entitled to 1 Representative, leaving a fraction of 122,246, and Florida, with a population of 269,493, would be entitled to 1 Representative, leaving a fraction of 115,208. Applying the rule heretofore observed, that is, of giving additional Representatives to the States having the largest fractions, these six States each would be entitled to an additional Representative. New York would be entitled to 33, Pennsylvania to 28, Illinois to 20, California to 6, Rhode Island to 2, and Florida to 2.

But let us see what this bill, prepared in accordance with the new method, proposes to do. It proposes to give to New York 34 Representatives, to Pennsylvania 29, to Illinois 21, to California 5, to Rhode Island 1, and to Florida 1. That is, New York shall have a Representative for every 149,496 of its population, which is 4,789 less than the ratio. Pennsylvania shall have a Representative for every 147,685 of its population, which is 6,600 less than the ratio; and Illinois shall have a Representative for every 146,565 of its population, which is 7,720 less than the ratio. California shall have a Representative for every 172,938 of its population, which is 18,703 more than the ratio. Rhode Island shall have a Representative for a population of 276,531, which is 122,246 more than the ratio; and Florida shall have a Representative for a population of 269,493, which is 115,208 more than the ratio.

Now, in the case of New York, if you will multiply 4,789 by the number of Representatives the bill gives to that State, namely, 34, you will find that New York will have representation in this House for 162,826 persons not in the State. Pennsylvania, in the same way, will have representation for 191,400 not in the State, and Illinois for 162,120 persons not in the State; while in California there will be 94,269 persons unrepresented here, in Rhode Island 122,246, and in Florida 115,208.

Mr. Speaker, in a word, this bill proposes to give to New York, with a population less than nineteen times the population of Florida, a representation thirty-four times greater than that of Florida; to Pennsylvania, with a population less than sixteen times the population of Florida, a representation twenty-nine times greater; and to Illinois, with a population about twelve times more than that of Florida, a representation twenty-one times greater.

The Constitution provides that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers. But this bill seeks not to apportion them among the States but among the districts of the States, and by such an apportionment to give to three States a Representative, as has been said, without a constituent.

In my opinion the easiest and fairest way to apportion representation is to apply the simple rule of three, that we learned when boys at school, and which has been explained so fully by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. CHACE.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to allude to some remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE.] He said: "It is desirable that the people should know well their Representatives," and "that Representatives should be close to their people." I most heartily agree with him. But how, I ask, should the bill he advocates become a law, can the 1 Representative it gives to Florida be close to his people, that State having an area of 59,268 square miles, which is 13,268 more than Pennsylvania, 12,258 more than New York, and 4,859 more than Illinois? How, I ask, can that 1 Representative know well his people with a constituency of 269,493? And I would also ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how the Representatives which the bill proposes to give to New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, who would have no constituencies at all, can "know well" and "be close to their people?"

Mr. BAYNE. If the gentleman will permit me, I reply that I was merely giving some of the reasons for a larger number of Representatives. Territorial area has nothing to do with apportioning them.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Suppose we adopt the proposition made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and give to the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois 84 Representatives. I would like to read the remarks of the gentleman upon this point on page 22 of to-day's RECORD, but I have not time. The aggregate population of those States, as mentioned by the gentleman yesterday, being 12,443,633, the ratio to each Representative will be 149,328. The difference between this and the ratio of 154,285 is 4,957. Multiply this by 84, and you find that New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois will have representation for 416,388 more inhabitants than those States contain. Giving to California, Rhode Island, and Florida but 7 members, the aggregate population of those States being 1,410,718, the ratio to each Representative will be 201,531. The difference between this and the ratio of 154,285 is 47,246. Multiply this by 7, and you find that these States will have an unrepresented population of 330,722.

But let us give these larger States 81 Representatives and the smaller ones 10 Representatives; you will find then, by a similar calculation, that New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois will have representation for 53,460 more inhabitants than are in those States, and California, Rhode Island, and Florida will have representation for 132,140 inhabitants more than they have, a difference of only 78,680. Now, I ask, Mr. Speaker, which is the fairer proposition—to give New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois 81 Representatives, and California, Rhode Island, and Florida 10, or the former three States 84 and the latter three 7? By the first plan, New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois will have representation for 53,460 more inhabitants than they have; California, Rhode Island, and Florida will have representation for 132,140 more than they have. By the latter plan, New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois will have representation for 416,388 more inhabitants than they contain, and California, Rhode Island, and Florida would have 330,722 inhabitants unrepresented. Can any gentleman hesitate a moment in declaring that these three additional Representatives should be given to these smaller States?

Mr. Speaker, it has been indirectly argued on this floor that the States should have representation according to wealth. It was so argued indirectly by my friend from New York, [Mr. PRESCOTT.] Sir, the Constitution sanctions no such rule. As a citizen of the United States I am proud of New York, proud of Pennsylvania, proud of Illinois. They are grand States; grand in population, grand in magnificent cities, and grand in wealth. I trust that their Representatives on this floor will not let their splendid reputations be tarnished now by harshly imposing upon a younger and smaller sister State.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, when the time yielded to Mr. DAVIDSON by Mr. COLERICK had expired,

Mr. PRESCOTT said: I yield to the gentleman from Florida five minutes of the time I have remaining.

Mr. DAVIDSON then resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I shall devote the few remarks which I make to what I conceive to be the fallacy involved in the new method. And, in so doing, all my illustrations will be based on the apportionment reported by the committee, of 320 members of the House, and a modulus of 154,285 persons to the member. (See page 29 of the Report of the Superintendent of the Census.)

Let us examine the difference between the old method of apportionment and the new method, so far as those States are concerned, which gain or lose according as we follow the one or the other of these modes of distribution.

According to Mr. Seaton's new method, the States of Illinois, New York, and Pennsylvania each gain a member at the expense of California, Florida, and Rhode Island.

Now, I have put into tables, compiled from the tables of Mr. Seaton, the ratio of each of these States, at the representation accorded to them under the two methods, and the variance between the State ratio and the standard modulus of 154,285 in each instance, which I ask to be printed as a part of my remarks:

I—By the old method.

States.	Number of members.	Ratio.	Variance.
Illinois	20	153,893	392
New York	33	154,026	159
Pennsylvania	28	152,960	1,325
California	6	144,115	10,170
Florida	2	134,746	19,539
Rhode Island	2	138,265	16,020

The figures for these State ratios are to be found on pages 43, 44, of the Superintendent's report.

II—By the new method.

States.	Number of members.	Ratio.	Variance.
Illinois	21	146,565	7,720
New York	34	149,496	4,789
Pennsylvania	29	147,685	6,600
California	5	172,938	18,653
Florida	1	269,493	115,208
Rhode Island	1	276,531	122,246

The figures for these State ratios are to be found on the same pages as the foregoing.

Now let us compare the variances from the standard modulus in each State, according to each of these methods. It will be seen that in every one of the States named, the old method produces less variation than the new method from the standard modulus of 154,285.

III—Comparison of variances under the old and new methods respectively.

States.	Variance, old method.	Variance, new method.
Illinois	392	7,720
New York	159	4,789
Pennsylvania	1,325	6,600
California	10,170	18,653
Florida	19,539	115,208
Rhode Island	16,020	122,246

Hence we see that in every one of these States the State ratio approximates more closely to the standard modulus of 154,285, under the old method, than it does under the new method.

But further. Let us take one of the large and one of the small States, for the sake of showing the fault of Mr. Seaton's method in another way. And we will still take a representation of 320 members, and the standard modulus of 154,285 persons to each member.

Under the old method of apportionment, California would have 5 members on even division, and on her fraction of 93,269 would gain another, making 6 members; while Pennsylvania would have 27 members on even division, and on her fraction of 117,196 would gain another, making 28 members.

Under the new method California would have 5 members, each representing 172,938 persons, while Pennsylvania would have 29 members, each representing 147,685 persons. (See Table E, page 54, or CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pages 778, 779.)

Now, the modulus is 154,285 persons for each Representative; hence, as each of 29 Representatives from Pennsylvania, according to the new method, would represent only 147,685 persons, there would be an actual deficiency in each Congressional district of Pennsylvania of 6,600 persons; that is, each Congressional district of Pennsylvania would fall short of the modulus by 6,600 persons. But Pennsylvania, having twenty-nine Congressional districts, her deficiency would be for the whole State twenty-nine times 6,600, equal to 191,400. So that Pennsylvania actually falls short of having a population sufficient for 29 members by 191,400 persons; and that number is more than the modulus, showing that Pennsylvania's shortage, when aggregated, should take off at least one of the 29 members, and reduce her to 28.

On the other hand, California, with 5 members, would have Congressional districts of 172,938 persons each, being a surplus in each Congressional district of 18,653 persons over the modulus; and multiplying that surplus by 5, since it would occur for each district, the aggregate surplus of the State over the modulus would be 93,275 persons, which fraction is large enough to entitle her to an additional member. Now, with 6 members, California would have 1 Representative to every 144,115 persons, making a deficiency in each Congressional district of 10,170 persons; that is, each Congressional district of California would fall short of the modulus by 10,170 persons. But this error would only occur 6 times in California, making the aggregate deficiency in California only 61,020 persons, so that her deficiency is not as much as should deprive her of a member.

According to Mr. Seaton's method you give preference to an error of 6,600 repeated twenty-nine times, rather than endure an error of 10,170 repeated only six times. The proposition is manifestly unjust to California, and unduly favorable to Pennsylvania.

The fallacy of Mr. Seaton's method is that it conceals its errors in their subdivision, by apportioning them among the numerous Congressional districts of a large State, and thus violating the direct mandate of the Constitution to apportion representation among the several States according to their population, and not according to the population of Congressional districts. The communication of the Superintendent of the Census, addressed to the chairman of the Census Committee of the Forty-sixth Congress, gives the old method, and clearly demonstrates its soundness.

But again, according to Mr. Seaton, the modulus for a House of 320 members is 154,285.

Suppose the population of Pennsylvania to have been exactly twenty-eight times 154,285, which is 4,319,980 persons. Now, if the basis of representation is 1 member for 154,285 persons, it is clear that 4,319,980 persons in Pennsylvania would be entitled to exactly 28 Representatives in the House without any fraction over at all. But Pennsylvania has a population less than 4,319,980, but Mr. Seaton says she is entitled to 1 more Representative, although her population is only 4,282,891, and involves the consideration of a fractional surplus.

Now let us take a hypothetical case and apply Mr. Seaton's principle. Suppose there were but two States, one with a population of exactly 600,000, and the other with a population of 12,100. A membership of 100 Representatives is desired. The modulus would be 6,121, which we will style the standard modulus. On even division this would give to the larger State 98 members, with a fractional excess of 142; and the smaller State 1 member, with a fractional excess of 5,979, making in all 99 members. Now, who is to get the additional member?

According to Mr. Seaton the allotment of 99 members to the larger State would give a ratio for that State of 6,060; but the allotment of 2 members to the smaller State would give that State a ratio of 6,050 only; hence, the larger State, approximating more closely to the standard modulus of 6,121, would get the additional member on account of a fractional excess of only 142 inhabitants; while the smaller State, with a fractional excess of 5,979 inhabitants, would have only 1 member for 12,100 inhabitants, the larger State having a member for every 6,060 inhabitants, which would be manifestly unjust.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to any bill arranged on the basis of Mr. Seaton's method. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is another error in the method of computation adopted in Mr. Seaton's tables. The modulus itself is not ascertained upon correct mathematical principles. Mr. Seaton's rule for ascertaining the modulus is to divide the total representative population by the proposed number of Representatives. Thus, for a House of 320 members he ascertains the modulus by dividing 49,371,340 by 320, obtaining as a quotient 154,285. But in this he ignores the fact that Delaware and Nevada, two of the States, do not derive their representation from the numbers of their population, since neither has a population mathematically as great as the modulus; but both of these States derive their representation from that clause of the Constitution which provides that each State shall have at least one Representative.

The true rule is, to deduct the representation of all States whose population is less than the modulus from the total number of Representatives proposed; and also deduct their population from the total population of the States. Then find the exact modulus by dividing the remainder of population by the remainder of proposed members.

For example:

The total population is	49,371,340
The population of Delaware and Nevada amounts to	208,874
The population of the remaining States is	49,162,466
The proposed membership is	320
Deduct one each for Delaware and Nevada	2
Leaving for the remaining States	318

Now divide 49,162,466 by 318, and we ascertain the true modulus for a House of 320 members to be 154,598, instead of 154,285, as tabulated by Mr. Seaton.

This is very important, since, if such a case as the "Alabama paradox" should exist, this error might affect the distribution of fractional representation among the States having the largest fractions, and disturb their relative rank in gaining a member on account of fractions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 58) for the relief of William H. Gill; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. McCOID. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee which reported this bill, and believing in its justice, I deem it to be my duty to say something in its defense. And I do this although I believe the temper of the House at this time is against any apportionment bill which will deprive the States of Rhode Island and Florida of their two members. But I wish to say, in behalf of the committee, that there was nothing in its deliberations which would not express the same sentiment I feel to be entertainedby the House. Certainly my own attitude would be friendly toward Rhode Island and Florida. The people of the country have nothing whatever to induce them to attempt to do wrong to Rhode Island. Sentiment alone, coming down to us from the time when she received her two members by the first apportionment, would be sufficient to make us desire at least to continue those two members to her now. And as to Florida, the twin sister of my own State in the family of States, I certainly have no disposition and no desire to do her injury.

Now, the only question presented is: What is the true interpretation of the Constitution upon the apportionment, and what is the true method to adopt in making it? I want the House to do me the kindness to leave Colonel Seaton's method out of view for a moment, and to leave the old method, if you will, also out of view. Let us consider this question: how shall we find the true ratio or yard-stick or measure with which we can go around among the States and measure them and give a Representative for each measure according to the Constitution? There are two methods, and I wish to put them fairly. One is to decide upon the number of Representatives and get a ratio by dividing that number into the population of the United States, and then to measure the States by it and give to the largest fractions additional members to which they are not found to be entitled by that first measure. It is the method of the largest fraction. The other is the one now proposed by the committee, which I intend to argue independently of Seaton's method or anything else; and that is this: to find a ratio or divisor or a yard-stick with which you can go around among the States and measure them and get the number of Representatives you want without any requirement of distributing additional members not found by the measurement.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the two methods. To get a ratio which will measure all the States and give 320, or get a ratio with which you may measure all the States and have yet some not found which will only give 302, leaving 18 to be distributed. I ask which is the proper one, which is the true ratio: that which when applied to the States will give the proposed number of your House, or that which when applied to the State will give 18 less than your House?

To illustrate that question, let us look at the table prepared by General Walker at the last session. Take the column of 320 members. In that column by this division he gets 302 members only, 18 having to be distributed. How does that happen? By my examination of that table I conclude it to appear in this way: Nevada has not the ratio that is applied, only having 62,000 inhabitants. Delaware has not the ratio that is applied, having only 146,608 inhabitants. How, then, did they get their Representative? Not by the ratio, but by the Constitution. Leave those out. That leaves thirty-six States to be apportioned by this proposed ratio. One-half of that is 18. You see the difference between 302 and 320 is just that one-half. One-half of the States are measured by that ratio and the other half are not measured by it. Add 18 to the 320, (you will find it lacks 18 of making enough,) add that to 320, and turn to the same table, on page 34, where General Walker gives a column of 338 members, and he divides that into the population of the United States, and gets a ratio, and then he applies that ratio to every State in the Union, and it gives him 320 members. That ratio is 146,069.

Now, there is a ratio, a factor, which, when applied to the population of every State in the Union, will give the number as 320. Is that the true ratio? What shall we do, find that kind of a ratio or not? I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is our constitutional duty to find that kind of a yard-stick to measure the States by. The Constitution says Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers. But that is not all the Constitution of the fathers says. It gave us that precept; but it also gave us an example to follow. What is that example? "That the number of Representatives shall not exceed 1 for every 30,000, but each State shall at least have one." Suppose this bill should say—I will be glad to have it so amended—that after the 3d of March, 1883, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 320 members, and the number of Representatives shall not exceed 1 for every 146,565 inhabitants. Just strike 30,000 out of your Constitution and put in the ratio you now find to be the true one, and measure the States by it. Is not the example of the Constitution complied with, carrying out also the precept which it lays down that Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to numbers?

But that is not all we have to guide us on this question. We have not only the precept of the Constitution and the example of the Constitution, but we have also the doctrines and the expositions of the fathers upon it, making it clear beyond question that a distribution upon the largest fractions is a violation of the Constitution.

It has been already stated in the argument of the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, that the first apportionment bill passed by Congress in 1792 was vetoed, and he quoted the veto message of General Washington; but I wish to call your attention to the reason of the veto once more. First, in giving his reasons, he says:

> The Constitution has prescribed that Representatives shall he apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers; and there is no one proportion or divisor which applied to the respective numbers of the States will yield the number and allotment of Representatives proposed by this bill.

Washington vetoed the first apportionment bill, then, upon that ground, that there was no factor, or ratio, or divisor, which, when applied to the population of each State respectively, would give the number of the House as proposed by that bill.

Then your divisor must be such a one as when applied to the States severally will give you the number of the House you want, or 320 members. What is that divisor? 146,565; or as I will show you, any number from 146,250 to 146,565, will do it.

Now, turn to the argument in Congress upon that question, and let us see further the sentiment of the founders of the Republic upon that subject. When the apportionment bill was up in 1791–92 Mr. Giles, in his remarks, (page 247, Annals of Congress, 1791, 1793,)—

> Observed that the apparent inequality in the representation of the smaller States was rendered equal by their representation in the Senate.

Mr. Madison said, (pages 263, 264, Annals of Congress, Second Congress, 1791–93:)

He was sorry that it almost always happened whenever any question of general policy and advantage to the Union was before the House, when gentlemen found themselves at a loss for general argument, they commonly resorted to local views; and at all times, as well as the present, when there was most occasion for members to act with the utmost coolness, when their judgment ought to be the least biased, it was to be regretted that those times they suffered their feelings, passions, and prejudices to govern reason. * * * And we are called upon to violate the Constitution by adopting a measure that will give representation for these separate and distinct fractions in the respective States.

Mr. Murray said:

I voted against that amendment because it was an attack on the principle of enlarged representation; and because the idea of fractional representation arrived at by the amendment was but a commutation of the evil of fractions from one State to another.

Mr. Madison said, (page 334, Annals of Second Congress:)

Gentlemen seemed to think that the larger States would not suffer so much from those inequalities as the smaller ones; but he would ask whether the people in every part of the United States were not to be considered as equal upon the floor of Congress? Ten or twenty thousand citizens of New York, North Carolina, or Virginia, when considered in relation to that House, were of as much consequence as the same number in Rhode Island or Delaware.

This whole question was the subject of an eminent debate in the apportionment bill in 1832 in the Twenty-second Congress, and fractional representation was again repudiated as in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. Frelinghuysen, discussing the question at that time—this question of the veto—said:

So President Washington treated the subject when it came before him under the imposing authority of both Houses of Congress. The national Legislature of that day had subjected the whole population of the United States to a division of 30,000, the proposed number for each Representative, and the process gave 120 members; more members, of course, than the same divisor when applied to the separate States would produce; and they disposed of the surplus members by distributing them among the States having the highest fractions. The bill was warmly debated in Congress and eventually sent to the President by a very small majority. It presented to his mind a very interesting case and a very solemn duty. He was called upon to give a practical exposition to the Constitution of the United States, and on a branch of it well calculated to excite very warmly the public feeling. He examined the act with the sagacious scrutiny of a statesman about to settle the great question in the apportionment of political power. He was not content on finding one fatal objection to this bill to rest his objection there and return it to Congress; he made his exceptions as broad as the case presented to him. He detected two substantial objections, and that which struck him as prominent, and which he placed in the foreground of his communication, was, as I apprehend, the very difficulty into which the present amendment will bring us.

He then quotes in his argument the veto message of President Washington, and continues as follows:

The Senate perceive, then, that the objections are distinct in their application, but that both insisted on the same principle, that the States in their separate population were to be regarded; and it is further worthy of notice that the second objection, instead of being the principal, or, as has been insisted, the only substantial difficulty with the President, was, in truth, only a just inference which he drew, as he explicitly states, from the first objection. In presenting the first objection the President seemed to consider it quite sufficient barely to state the fact of there existing no one proportion or divisor that would produce the result of the bill before him. He enters into no argument, but thought he had said enough to produce conviction with any mind. The debates that were had on this rejected bill in the House of Representatives confirm the views which I had the honor to urge. The representation of fractions was then resisted on constitutional grounds. Mr. Madison opposed it in terms for this cause and urged the following cogent consideration: "You are calling upon us to invade the Constitution by adopting a process that will give Representatives for those several and distinct fractions of the different States."

When this bill was returned the Congress passed a new bill with a ratio of 33,000, and applied that to the population of each State. New Jersey, having at that time 179,570 federal numbers, received by the bill 5 members, with a fraction remaining of 14,570; and the whole apportionment of Representatives on the population of that era (being 3,615,920) left an amount of fractions exceeding 150,000. Yet, sir, it was submitted to. So in 1800, again in 1810, and last in 1820, with increased fractions at each period, but with the same acquiescence in the construction of President Washington in 1792. Mr. President, if I could think this a debatable point originally, such an adjustment of it, followed by such confirmation, would prevail to quiet all scruples.

Mr. Marcy, in that debate, said, (page 506, volume viii, part 1 Congressional Debates,) General Washington's first objection to the bill of 1792 was, that—

There was no proportion or divisor which applied to the respective numbers of the States, will yield the number and allotment of Representatives proposed by the bill. Now sir, I ask the mover of the amendment to tell us what proportion or divisor, applied to the respective numbers of the States, will produce his House of 255 members, I venture to assert there is none.

I will read those passages in Marshall's Life of Washington which relate to the bill of 1792:

Construing the Constitution to authorize a process by which the whole number of Representatives should be ascertained on the whole population of the United States, and afterward "apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers," the Senate applied the number 30,000 as a divisor to the total population; and taking the quotient, which was 120, the number of Representatives given by the ratio which had been adopted in the House where the bill had originated, they apportioned that number among the several States, by that ratio, until as many Representatives as it would give were allotted to each. The residuary numbers were then distributed among the States having the highest fractions.

The proposition of dividing on fractions is explicitly considered, directly passed and clearly repudiated as unconstitutional.

To show what the views of Mr. Madison on this constitutional question were, there are presented two short extracts from the debate on the apportionment bill of 1792:

The idea of fractions, said he, was not there contended for, but has since become the very essence of the opposition; and we are called on to violate the Constitution, by adopting a measure that will give Representatives to those separate and distinct fractions in the respective States. If this reasoning is good, why do the gentlemen stop at this boundary of representation by States? Why not proceed to erect the whole United States into one district, without any division, in order to prevent the inequality they conceive to exist in respect to individual States? (Debate, 19 December, 1791.)

Mr. Madison repeated the substance of what he had before offered in objection to this proposition. Fractions will exist, said he, on every possible plan. This is to be a permanent law, and in its operation will probably increase those fractions. The Constitution refers to the respective numbers of the States, and not to any aggregate number. The proposition breaks down the barriers between the State and General Governments, and involves a consolidation. (Debate, February 16, 1792.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, if anything is clear from the veto of President Washington and the debates upon it, this is clear, that that veto decided, and the Senate and House at that time by refusing to pass the bill over the veto and providing another bill taking no account of fractions, that to allow representation to the largest fraction is unconstitutional. That decision was abided by in every apportionment up to 1840 at least, and was expressly confirmed by the precedent of 1832, and when gentlemen say that since 1840 this other method of fractions has been adopted, I think they have not studied closely the question.

My theory of the question of apportionment since 1840 is this: the excitement grew high in politics in connection with the question of slavery, and since that time, till 1860, it was simply a political compromise every time the question came up. Now, if it was unconstitutional for fifty years, from the date of the fathers till 1840, to divide by a ratio and then distribute the additional members to the largest fraction, what are you going to do to-day? The grave question comes to us: Shall you reverse that decision coming down to us from those men who made the Constitution of the Government? This consideration impressed the committee.

I found, Mr. Speaker, when I came into the House and talked about this bill, that members stated to me "You cannot find a ratio which, when applied to every State in the Union, will give 320," and it was a process of logic and demonstration to convince them that that was so. Just let any man that seeks to convince himself turn to the old table, which all these opponents seem to pin their faith to, to that column of the table showing 338 as the number of the members of the House. Look down the column. By an even division it gives 320 members. But it reveals another fact far more important than that; and that is that the aggregate fractions in the United States, by a division of the true ratio, leaves a less number than by any other process that you have yet discussed or that has been proposed.

You divide the population of the States of this Union by 146,565, which can be done, and give 320 members, and you will have 2,300,000 of an aggregate fraction. Dividing it by any other method will give an aggregate fraction of 2,600,000. And I want to make this statement: By this division, by a common ratio which will give the number of the House as 320, about 4½ per cent. of the people of the United States remain unrepresented as an aggregate fraction. By any other method, by the method of 154,285 as a divisor, 6 per cent. of the people of the United States are unrepresented. There is a difference of unrepresented fractions between the two methods of almost 1½ per cent. of the whole population of the United States.

Now how shall you find the true ratio? We have a varying population, from 62,000 in Nevada to 5,082,000 in New York. Gentlemen must remember that when you make any argument on the basis of comparing two States, you have started out from a wrong premise, and your logic will lead you to a fallacy every time. For instance, if the United States were composed only of Rhode Island and New York, then you might argue from the comparison of Rhode Island and New York; but you would find then that New York would get 18 members when Rhode Island got 1. But turn it over again and take a comparison between New York and Kansas, leave out the complex proportions that arise when you compare the whole thirty-eight States. Simply single out Kansas and New York and then you will find that New York would have 33 members when Kansas had 6. Now, when you take Kansas, Rhode Island, and New York together, do you not see New York cannot have 18 to Rhode Island's 2, and 33 to the 6 of Kansas at the same time? What results? Why, a complex proportion, and you are arguing from a simple proportion between two things, while the proportion on this apportionment is complex between thirty-eight States, or, if you give 2 Representatives under the Constitution, 1 to Nevada and 1 to Delaware, between thirty-six States which are to be divided by the yard-stick or the bushel that you adopt.

In comparing numbers you cannot compare them without a measure, without a basis, without a ratio. And comparing numbers you must have a common factor; it is the only way to measure them. When you cannot have a common factor like 5, 10, 15, 20, or 30, what do you do? You take that which approximates nearest to the common factor, or a ratio which when applied to each number will give the quotient for each, which will make the total that you want. Take 146,565, and measure Rhode Island by it, and give her 1 for each multiple, and what does she get? One, with a large fraction. Measure New York by it, and she gets 34 with a fraction. Measure Kansas by it, and she gets 6 Representatives, with a fraction.

Now, disregarding the fractions, and taking the even divisions of measurement by the yard-stick, giving one for each all through the thirty-eight States, and you have 320 members by a common divisor, which President Washington said was fair, and of which the Constitution laid down an example in giving the number of the House.

Now, can this be simpler? Strike from the Constitution of the United States "30,000," where it says the number of Representatives shall not exceed 1 for each 30,000, and put in its stead "146,565," which you see, if the proposed House is 320, is right, and provide that the number of Representatives shall not exceed 1 for every 146,565 of population, and will not that be a constitutional method? Who can find an exception to the language of the Constitution applied to an apportionment bill according to the example laid down in it?

You may raise questions about figures; you may compare certain States; you may show outrages as you will, and wrongs and inequalities, for they will be found in any bill, and just as outrageous in any other as you will find in this.

For instance, the opposition against this bill started with my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] in a striking argument, which impressed me with its weight, by its grouping together for comparison three large States and three small ones. But did the gentleman forget that he was selecting only the 320 column of the table; and that if he had turned back to the 319 column the comparison would not have been between the large States and the small States? And at 318 it would not have been, and at 317 it would not have been between the large States and the three small States. He happened to select the only number which sustained his argument. But that proves nothing. The gentleman from Massachusetts says, Will these large States do this wrong to the small ones? Or will the States that are not affected by this bill consent that this outrage shall be done?

My friend from Massachusetts himself voted for the 319 bill at the last session. The 319 bill gave to Iowa, which had 1,624,615 inhabitants, 10 Representatives, and to Massachusetts with 1,783,085 inhabitants, it gave 12 Representatives. The difference was 157,000. Now, if 154,000 was the ratio, and under it Iowa was entitled to 10 Representatives, then on the difference between Iowa and Massachusetts of 157,000, Massachusetts should get one more Representative than Iowa, or 11 in all. Now, why did Massachusetts get the twelfth Representative, or where is the man in Massachusetts to represent nobody under the bill? [Laughter.] Yet that was the fact, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, with his great desire to do equity and justice, did not lift his voice to cry against the wrong when the spoils were taken from Iowa and laid in the lap of Massachusetts. He was sweetly content when that bill passed. [Laughter.]

And the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] brings a "grain of common sense" to the consideration of this question; yet he voted for the 319 bill. Let us see what that bill did. The 319 bill of the last session gave to Iowa 10 Representatives for 1,624,000 inhabitants, and to Michigan 11 Representatives for 1,636,000; just 12,000 more than Iowa had. Now 12,000 into 154,000 goes 13 times; it is one-thirteenth of a ratio. Now, who from Michigan is the representative of that one-thirteenth of a man? [Laughter.] For the sake of the argument we may admit that a man could be found in Michigan small enough to fill that bill.

Mr. HORR. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that I am glad he has reduced it to two States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALDRICH.) Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOID. I do not yield.

Mr. HORR. I would like to have the gentleman solve this proposition.

Mr. McCOID. Not now.

Mr. HORR. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McCOID. On this point? Anything you want to ask.

Mr. HORR. Suppose you throw out of the account every State but New York and Rhode Island.

Mr. McCOID. That is not on this point, and I decline to yield. Now, these gentlemen whose ideas of equity would not allow them to vote for this bill—and the pertinent question put by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] was—who is it in New York who is going to represent the eighty-nine hundredths of a man? yet he wants only one-thirteenth part represented by Michigan.

Mr. HORR. The gentleman is mistaken. The question I asked was, who would represent the ciphers where there was not one man?

Mr. McCOID. Yes; and the same man could as well represent nothing as the one-thirteenth part of a man. Yet the gentleman was not heard to cry out at that time against the injustice of the 319 bill. He thought that was merely a necessary accident in a complex proportion.

But to-day, when you get a ratio that will apply to every State in the Union and give the exact number of the House, following the Constitution and its example, and the veto message of the Father of his Country, and the precedents of fifty years, he now finds that because a State is so small that the ratio will not go into it twice, the whole bill is wrong from that one example of inequality.

Mr. BRIGGS. I would ask the gentleman if the Seaton method was the one in use for the first fifty years of the Government?

Mr. McCOID. I have asked the House not to think of this Seaton method, but of this bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. This bill is on the Seaton method.

Mr. McCOID. Not at all.

Mr. BRIGGS. Then you back out of that.

Mr. McCOID. Not at all. When I drew up this bill originally I took the ratio of 146,565 for every State.

Mr. BRIGGS. I only take the speech of the chairman of your committee.

Mr. McCOID. I am making my own speech.

Mr. BRIGGS. Exactly.

Mr. McCOID. I would have liked to have made it, then. These inequalities will arise. What is the test? I think this is it: Courts do injustice in many cases, and yet on an average courts deal out justice, and therefore we believe in courts. The average justice of a bill is what you want. A bill that will leave the smallest aggregate of fractions in the United States, if that aggregate was divided by thirty-eight, will it not leave the smallest average fraction in a State? Certainly it will. Average justice is done when the least average fraction is left in every State. All arguments that have been made from anything else are simple fallacies from a single comparison of two States, and forgetting the complex proportions of the thirty-eight.

Now let us examine for a moment the old method which these gentlemen seem to think so sacred. And let me correct one error. It is said on this floor that this new theory which gentlemen have been discussing as the foundation of this bill is Colonel Seaton's, not General Walker's. General Walker received the praises of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] last session for his scientific and exhaustive research upon this subject. His ability upon this topic is unquestioned and pre-eminent; and if this were General Walker's proposition, these gentlemen seem to think they would surrender to his discretion, having at the last session accepted what came from his office without even scrutiny. Now let us see what General Walker does say upon this question. Let us see whether Colonel Seaton alone is responsible. General Walker says:

> A second series of tables exhibits the distribution of Representatives according to the scheme of Colonel C. W. Seaton, chief clerk of the bureau, who has been nominated to the Senate, and by that body confirmed as my successor in office. Colonel Seaton deems the method he has taken for determining the number of Representatives to which each State should become entitled more equitable than that heretofore employed; and in that opinion I concur.

What is the trouble in the confusion of the Seaton method with this bill? It is this: Colonel Seaton started upon 154,285 as a ratio and approximated down until he got the last Representative on 320 from Illinois, giving each district in that State 146,565. The fact is, in this circuitous way he came to just what the old method does. There is a ratio which, when applied to every State, will give 320. That ratio is the number which the Illinois Representative will have when he comes in under that table upon the Seaton method. You turn to the old table and you find it just as clear. Look at the result of dividing 328 into the population of the United States and that quotient among the States. Does it not give 320 in the first instance? Take any column in that old table A, except columns where on even division the number remains the same, and go eighteen columns ahead and see what the result is. Why, the number that you want in the House is given eighteen tables ahead by an even division. So the old method is all we want except this: we want to adopt that ratio under the old method which, when divided into the States, will give the number you want in the House, and not that ratio upon which you have to distribute arbitrarily the largest fractions.

Let us see now. You divide by 320, that gives you 302 members. What do you do now? To eighteen States you give Representatives on the basis of 320 members, do you not? Certainly; because they divided evenly. Now what do you do? You add 18 more to other States, which puts each one of those States on a basis of 338 members in the House. So you have given half the House a ratio at 320 and half the House a ratio at 338.

Now let us look at the old method of giving representation to the largest fractions. Look at 275—the first column. It is a defective application of the moiety system, that is all. To get 275 members what do you do? You divide by your ratio and get 257 members; then you distribute fractions to seventeen States that have a moiety and you deny representation to one State that has a moiety because it would give you one more Representative than you started out to get. Take the column 277. You divide by the ratio giving 257 members; you give the fractions to the largest number having a moiety, except the State of Arkansas, which you refuse to take in although she has more than a moiety.

You apply the moiety system to every State but one, and you reject it as to that one. Why? Because it would give you 278 members instead of the number you started out to get. Take the next column, 278. You divide through and give the fractions to every moiety but one. Virginia has a moiety, and you refuse her a Representative for that moiety because, if you should give her one, it would make the number 279, one more than you started out to get. So in every column you apply the moiety system excepting one State, to which you deny representation for a moiety. Here is a paradox more outrageous and unjust than any other, because on your own process you refuse to do justice to the States entitled.

Take the next column, 279. Under this Connecticut, having over a moiety, is denied a Representative for that moiety. In the next column, 280, West Virginia has over a moiety, for which she is denied a Representative. In the next column Illinois has over a moiety, for which she is denied a Representative.

Mr. HORR. Now will not the gentleman take 321?

Mr. McCOID. Column 321 is itself an exceptional one, an anomaly showing the table to be governed by rule or principle.

Mr. HORR. Then 321 is not subject to your objection?

Mr. McCOID. Three hundred and twenty-one fills all the moieties. In that exceptional instance the rule works; but it is only an exception to the rule.

Now, can it be said that the old method does not do injustice to the small States, while the new one does? Take Minnesota. With an apportionment of 289 members she would be entitled to a member on her moiety; but you deny her representation on the moiety, while you give a Representative to New Jersey. Take the next number, 290. Again Minnesota has a moiety, for which she is entitled to a Representative; but you refuse to give her this Representative, and give one to Indiana. Indiana before that had a far less fraction than Minnesota.

Take the next number, 291, and Minnesota is still entitled with her fraction, now being 102,000, and what do you do? You give it to Michigan, which at the time Minnesota was entitled had but 99,000, and now Minnesota has 102,000, and you give to Michigan in preference, she having come in afterward.

Now at 292 she gets tardy justice, having before been supplanted by other States. If you had carried out the moiety system she would have got it ahead of all these others. You denied it to her upon the plan on which you say you are acting, which is the moiety system.

Mr. HORR. If the gentleman would permit me I should like before he leaves this to submit now the proposition I wished to do a moment ago. I do not wish to interrupt his speech, but I should like, on the modulus plan——

Mr. McCOID. You can do it after I get through. Not being on the point I am now discussing I could not take it up out of its order.

Now as to paradoxes. In addition to those I have already mentioned, let me call attention to some others. Alabama, under that old table to which you cling with such tenacity, gains 1 at 299 on a fraction of 100,651 according to the ratio of 165,122, and loses 1 at 300 on a fraction of 110,000—more than she had when she got it.

Georgia gains 1 at 306 on a fraction of 90,084 on a ratio of 161,334, and loses that one at 307 on a fraction of 94,000 on a ratio of 160,819. Again Georgia gains 1 at 334 (and I mean when I say 334, column 334 in the table to which I have already referred) at a ratio of 147,818 on a fraction of 64,000, and loses 1 at 335 on the ratio of 147,377, and a fraction of 68,410. Maine gains 1 at column 339 on a ratio of 145,638, and a fraction of 66,384, and loses 1 at 340, on a ratio of 145,210, on a fraction of 68,096. Minnesota at 285 has a fraction of 87,841 on a ratio of 173,283. At 286 she has a fraction of 90,265; at 287 she has a fraction of 92,669; at 288 she has a fraction of 95,061; at 289 she has a fraction of 97,333; at 290, a fraction of 99,789; at 291, a fraction of 102,129. All these fractions being over one-half the ratio, she gets no increase under the moiety system, while Mississippi increases 1 on a fraction of 92,199. Pennsylvania also holds an increase during all that time, which she received on a fraction of 95,923. Missouri has increased on a fraction of 96,856, at column 286. Ohio is increased on a fraction of 101,594, and Kentucky is increased on a fraction of 100,456, in column 287. New York, which had a fraction of but 59,000 when Minnesota was entitled to an increase at 285, is increased at 288 long before Minnesota got her increase; Indiana at 290, Michigan at 291, while Minnesota is postponed to 292. And yet you say under the new bill the large States wrong the small ones. Here is Minnesota, which has been wronged by all the large States out of her just increase on your own table during all that time.

I have only this to say, Mr. Speaker: I have carefully examined this old table, column after column, and it is full of just such anomalies, and paradoxes, and exceptions, and injustices, and wrongs. I feel justified, here to-day, to say that it is an iniquity far in excess of the bill presented, or the Seaton method itself, upon which the bill is not entirely founded.

How have our States acted on this question of distribution? Let us learn something from their example. Apportioning upon a fixed ratio, without allowing fractions, after a hurried review I made this morning, I find Colorado, California, Kansas, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia. These all have in their constitutions a provision by which the ratio is to be fixed, and that yard-stick measured around among the counties, and representation given for every multiple, just as in this bill, disregarding fractions.

Iowa has an express provision in her constitution by which fractions over one-half the ratio are given representation; and I submit it to the House, must you not have it in every constitution by which the ratios shall be fixed, and 1 Representative given for each and 1 for every fraction over one-half. If that was in the Constitution of the United States, we would have no difficulty about giving a ratio directly. But it is not there, and the decision of the fathers is against it.

But now I want to ask the attention of gentlemen to another point in connection with this question. There has been objection made in reference to the distribution or the division of the districts, and a portion of the gentlemen who have spoken upon this point have argued that to distribute the Representatives in districts having an equal number of inhabitants is not the object in apportionment. How many believe that—that it is not the object to make your representative districts as nearly equal as possible in inhabitants? I say it is a good rule upon which to give representation, to require the districts in the several States, large and small, to be as nearly equal in population as possible. Your bill reads thus in the third section:

> That in each State entitled under this apportionment the number to which such State may be entitled in the Forty-eighth, and each subsequent Congress, shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants.

And that is not a new thing in this bill. It is the law of the United States to-day, and has been for years, that each district shall have as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants. How can we get that unless you adopt a ratio, and apply it to every State, giving 1 Representative for each multiple of it?

Now there have been some arguments, too, as to the injustice of this bill. Let me give you one or two tables which I have here, from which tables you will observe that I have taken the thirty-eight States of the Union and divided them by two, showing nineteen States having less than 1,000,000 inabitants each, and nineteen having more than 1,000,000:

The nineteen that have less than 1,000,000 I have tabulated, and the total population in those States foots up 10,360,199. Under this bill those 10,000,000 of inhabitants get 64 Representatives. Ten millions is about one-fifth of the total population of the United States, giving the odds in favor of these States. Sixty-four multiplied by five makes how many? So that one-fifth of the population of the United States, being in States having less than 1,000,000 of inhabitants each, making a total of 10,000,000 of inhabitants, get one-fifth of the total representation under this bill, just what they ought to have.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHERWIN. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that by unanimous consent the time of the gentleman may be extended.

Mr. ANDERSON. I hope he will be allowed to go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALDRICH in the chair.) How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BAYNE. Let him finish his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCOID. Of the States between one and two million of inhabitants the total population is 21,000,000, and those States under this bill will receive 137 Representatives, being two-fifths of the whole number of the House. Multiply 64 by 2 and you have 128 that they would be entitled to; so are not the small States between one and two millions fairly dealt with? Justice has been done to those States containing a population of less than 1,000,000. Justice has been done to those States having less than 2,000,000.

Then there remains the five States, Missouri, Illinois, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York. These States under the bill get 119 members. They have about nineteen millions of people. Are they not entitled to the remainder of less than two-fifths of the Representatives under this census? Can you make a fairer distribution by States?

I am now talking of the general question of the States. I admit that you can submit a proposition as between two States, which you may compare, which will show a gross injustice. But I answer that argument by saying that I can give you one for one by any method you will produce of that same kind.

As Mr. Madison said, fractions will happen and great fractions too, but you cannot help it in the complex proportion of so many States.

I will not occupy the time of the House by reading these tables which I have prepared, but will print them with my remarks.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] who made one of the strongest presentations, from his stand-point, in behalf of that little State, which has to suffer under any apportionment that is made, an argument which I appreciate for its ability and fairness, and its want of those broad assertions impugning personal motives which pervaded many of those which were made by other gentlemen, although they were dressed in the garb of wit, he made a fair presentation of the case and argued this, as to some States contiguous to each other, that they will get unfair proportions under this bill. Now I want to show simply that under the old method the same thing would happen. Take the New England States, for instance, with some of the Eastern States—the smaller States, as Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Vermont, Delaware, and New Jersey—and with a total population of 5,483,469 they will get under the old method 22 members, while New York, having a population of 5,082,871, but a small fraction under that total, gets 33 members under the old method, eleven more than these States, having as they do a population 400,000 greater than it.

Now, why is that? It is a gross outrage, you say, that 5,000,000 in New York should get eleven more Representatives than 5,000,000 in New England. It is because the States in New England are States that have fractions because of their small territory and population, and that inequality will come in spite of any method that is used.

Mr. CHACE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCOID. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHACE. The gentleman proves that the representation of these small States is inequitable under the old method. Does he think it right to introduce a method that will aggravate the evil?

Mr. McCOID. I do not think it is right to introduce any method that is not right on principle. But I think it is right and just to follow a true constitutional principle without regard to these exceptions which I can find under any method you can bring forward. And as that is true of the old as well as the new, it does not prove anything against either.

Now if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] desires to propose a question I should be glad to answer it.

A MEMBER. The gentleman from Michigan has just gone out.

Mr. McCOID. Or I shall be willing to answer any other question that seems to militate against the principle of this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if under the old method there is any instance in which the increase of the population of a State would reduce its representation?

Mr. McCOID. Yes, sir. I cite the cases of Alabama, Georgia, and Maine. The fraction increases and they lose a member.

Mr. DINGLEY. And I would ask the gentleman if the same difficulty does not exist with the new method? In the case of Pennsylvania I find if the population under the new method was increased 37,054 it would have only 28 members. But under the new method, with its population remaining as it is, without any increase, it has 29 members.

Mr. McCOID. I do not quite catch that statement.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will repeat it. I find that Pennsylvania, under the new method, if its population should be increased 37,054, would have only 28 members; but without any increase it is given a representation of 29 members. How does that happen?

Mr. McCOID. I think the gentleman is figuring on a ratio of 154,285.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am taking the ratio the gentleman from Iowa has suggested.

Mr. McCOID. Will the gentleman say that, with a ratio of 146,565 applied to Pennsylvania, going into that State twenty-nine times, you can increase the number of her population and divide it again by 146,565 and give a less number of Representatives?

Mr. DINGLEY. I am taking the same ratio which has been used as a divisor in the other States.

Mr. McCOID. That is where the gentleman is wrong. The ratio I am arguing from is 146,565, the yard-stick which the bill applies to every State. Now, no State can get a Representative by the division of that number at one place and lose him at another, because if it does not go into the State so many times she will not get that number of Representatives, and only gets a Representative for every multiple of that number. Therefore no such anomaly could happen.

Mr. HAZELTON. What would the representation of Wisconsin be under that ratio of 146,565? Standing at 8 Representatives, would she not lose 1 additional Representative by falling 300 short of your ratio?

Mr. McCOID. She would receive 1 Representative for every multiple of that ratio contained in her population. If she fell below the number which would contain that ratio nine times, of course she would get but 8; 146,565 goes into her population eight times, with a fraction over of 141,977.

Mr. HAZELTON. Then in the RECORD of February 1 there is a mistake in the figures.

Mr. McCOID. The gentleman is confusing the ratio. This is a ratio of 146,565, and that is a different ratio from anything I have seen printed.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. Under the old method, as compared with the new, with any other number that has been proposed from 307 to 325, would as great injustice be done to two or three of the States, for instance, Rhode Island, Florida, and California, particularly the first two, as is proposed under this bill?

Mr. McCOID. Mr. Speaker, that recalls me to answer the question fully as to California.

Mr. PAGE. I say the first two in particular, Rhode Island and Florida. I hold the gentleman to the first two.

Mr. McCOID. I say California is far from suffering any injustice.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman about the other two.

Mr. McCOID. Let me answer, please, in my own way.

Mr. HERBERT. While the gentleman from Iowa is on California, let me ask him this question: He says that 146,565, the number of persons to a Representative in the State of Illinois, if run through the population of all the States, will give exactly the number of Representatives, 320, that this bill gives.

Mr. McCOID. I say that.

Mr. HERBERT. Now then I say that in Illinois, according to that, every member has behind him exactly 146,565 of a population; and in California every member has behind him 172,938. Then the difference between the number in each district in California and the number in each district in Illinois is 26,373. That occurs five times in California. Multiply that 26,373 of difference in each district between the districts of California and Illinois by five, and we have in California 131,865 left unrepresented.

Mr. McCOID. You are quite right.

Mr. HERBERT. I want, then, to ask the gentleman whether there is anything in the moiety system which he has been discussing that is so grossly unjust as this which occurs under the Seaton method?

Mr. McCOID. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. California by this Seaton method loses representation for 131,865 of her population.

Mr. McCOID. Certainly; but worse happens under the old method, a great deal worse. Let me show you. Under the old method California gets 6 Representatives with a minority of 61,106; mark that.

Mr. PAGE. How do you get that?

Mr. McCOID. You would get one Representative on a large fraction.

Mr. PAGE. On what basis?

Mr. McCOID. Therefore you would lack the difference between that fraction for which you were given a number and the true ratio.

Mr. PAGE. On what number do you figure?

Mr. McCOID. On 154,000, the old method. Under the old method South Carolina would get six Representatives, and have a surplus of 69,867. Now, in order to get the difference between South Carolina and California, you must add the two fractions together, which would make 131,402 as the difference between South Carolina and California. Is not that as great as the one you hold me to?

The trouble is this with the gentleman: in order to get the anomalies under the old method, where you allow members for fractions, you must add the difference between the fractions and the ratio, in order to get the true difference between the States. That will exceed any difference under this bill.

Mr. HAZELTON. You have pretty much exhausted that.

Mr. McCOID. I think so.

Mr. HAZELTON. Now, I want to call the gentleman back to Wisconsin. Either he is mistaken to-day or the report made by his committee, which seems to be carefully compiled and calculated, as published in the RECORD of February 1, is entirely erroneous.

Mr. McCOID. The committee made no report of tables.

Mr. HAZELTON. It is a statement from the committee from which they draw their conclusions.

Mr. McCOID. The gentleman is mistaken. It is not a table from the committee, not a report of the committee, but the old Table A of the last House.

Mr. HAZELTON. Now, the trouble with the gentleman is——

Mr. McCOID. I will answer the gentleman in advance. He is reading a fraction on a ratio of 154,000, and I am reading a fraction on the true ratio.

Mr. HAZELTON. On a ratio of 146,000 Illinois gets 11 members, while Wisconsin, with only 146,000 population less than Illinois, gets but 9 members. So that we lose on that very showing a fraction of 146,000.

Mr. McCOID. The gentleman is entirely wrong in his figures. I would be glad indeed to answer all of these questions, but I think it would be trespassing upon the House and upon others who I know desire to speak, and I do not think I should wrong them to accommodate my own wishes.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I regret my absence during this debate. I made the request as modestly as I could of my colleague, the chairman, [Mr. PRESCOTT,] for its postponement until to-day. I desired much to be here; because, after I had at home examined anew this matter, I convinced myself that however scientific and mathematical the new method might be, there was not that equality and fairness in it, under the Constitution, as in the old method. I had no chance to examine closely the new method. It had never been seen by me till just before the committee met.

Why did I introduce my amendment under the new method? Because, before I made a careful examination, I perceived that it had the indorsement of the outgoing and incumbent Superintendent of Census, whose opinions I greatly respect. Without any chance to pursue the arithmetic necessary to test the new method, I saved a place for my amendment, which I can either withdraw or modify if the matter be not recommitted. I shall make a motion to recommit with instructions to report a measure on the old method. I cannot say that I will stay by my favorite number, 307, although I desire a vote on it. The reason is local. Our New York Legislature is in a dead-lock. It is Democratic, but our governor is Republican. If any bill for redistricting should pass, the governor, likely, would veto it. That would, by the old method, on 307, make New York one less than her present number, or reduce her from 33 to 32; so that in case of failure to redistrict, the whole number, 32, would have to be elected by the un-Republican, un-Democratic method of "general ticket." When we enter upon the scrutin de liste, it should be done upon reasons, not chance.

Members will therefore see that while last session, with a prospect for a redistricting, I could well afford to drop one for New York, it is a little too much risk to do it now. Still I am not fairly reproached by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COLERICK] for being local. I cut down New York one member by my bill of last session, to which he would not agree; and in consequence of his dissent in part, my bill was injured; while his bill gained one for Indiana on and after 311. However, I hope before I am through with my remarks to merit, if not the eulogium he pronounced upon my speech of last Congress, at least his commendation for my reasoning in treating the two methods.

The truth is that no member here is better situated to be entirely just to States, large and small, East and West, North and South, than myself. No one can complain of any party or sectional favoritism on my part. Illinois cannot; for this bill of the committee for 320—new method—was passed in committee by one majority, because it raised one more for Illinois, from 20 to 21; and my good friend [Mr. SHERWIN] frankly owned that he was influenced by it.

I will be frank and brief in dealing with this bill. I voted in committee, my preference for that of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COLERICK,] for 316, after my amendment failed; because 320 on the new or old method did not strike me as fair; and I have no deference for the conclusion of the committee on this subject, either as to increasing the number or the doubtful method.

Again and again, in the last session of the last Congress, I urged, on the score of economy, convenience, and equality, a just apportionment. The Constitution was peremptory that it should be made. The data were provided. They were not seriously questioned. On the day of the final returns of population the House ordered them to be printed, and the business began. Tabulated statements showing the ratios on the various propositions as to membership were prepared and printed. The Legislatures of the States were eager and expectant. They were ready to redistrict. Those which met biennially, twenty-two, would not meet again till after the election of 1882. Every reason, including the urgent entreaty of the press and people, demanded action. Every factor then known entering into this fundamental work was understood, or ready for the understanding.

Why was that action thwarted? The RECORD shows. Not until the last moment, when too late for the Senate to act, were we permitted to pass any bill. Finally, a bill was allowed to pass, after every concession was made to the minority; and even then the minority was so reserved that if it did not get its own number it would still hinder the passage of any bill. To this deplorable depth the opposition sank, refusing while present to vote until they made terms of their own. No attempt was made to reach a result, save by the majority. The plan—not the number I proposed—finally presented by the committee was generally conceded to be fair. The Census Office approved. It was the plan—corrected and improved—of many and continuous precedents, from almost the beginning of the Government.

After some diversity, it was agreed by the majority of the committee, as the RECORD shows, that 307 was the best number; 301 as first proposed by me, and 311 proposed by the gentleman [Mr. THOMPSON] from Kentucky, being withdrawn; and 307 was championed by nearly all on this side. It was not the final choice of the House, but it was just. Why it was opposed by some we know. The Western members, especially those west of the Mississippi, desired a larger number. The party in the minority then desired a larger number, because it helped that party. Some who strove to defeat all action, like my colleague, [Mr. CROWLEY,] preferred a smaller number. The responsibility for our failure is fixed. The seven millions of cost by our failure does not lie at our door. My purpose is not to pursue the example set, but in the present emergency to do what is best for our republican system. The tactics you taught us I am not willing to practice. So that I trust no dilatory motions will be used by the present minority to defeat final and prompt action.

It was said by Republican journalists then,* as by General Walker, Superintendent of the Census, that 307 was the nearest approximation to accuracy. It was almost an ideal of accuracy. Why was it opposed? First, some contended that votes, not numbers, should be counted. This absurdity grew in shallow soil; it took no root. Then, that under the fourteenth amendment there should be an abridgment of representation. This was directed against the South; but it clipped the wings of Rhode Island and Massachusetts; the tares which the devil of party had sown choked it; it did not thrive. Then we got rid of the moiety plan; and then that by equal division. Both were remotely approximate and imperfect.

The idea of wealth being a factor in the apportionment was the wonderful discovery of this session by the head of this committee. Of this I have to say, if it was serious, that it provokes nothing but merriment among the well-informed. It was the very thing discarded in the Constitution, except as to the two-fifths property in the (then) slaves, which was eliminated by the recent war and amendment of the Constitution.

The secret of the costly postponement of the measure to this session was, that this Congress would have a Republican majority, and it could do as it pleased. Bound up with apportionment was the Electoral College, and one vote therein is important!

Since then a new method has been presented by the new Superintendent of the Census. I do not say that there is any partisan motive or bias in this new process. It may be intended to reconcile what I called the "Alabama paradox." As such it was entitled to our studious scrutiny and best judgment. This I have given since the committee met. I have not been influenced by the discussion, only the meager telegraphic accounts of which I have seen. But I saw in them that members had, with that quick sense of local interest for which I was unjustly censured, discovered results most anomalous and unfair. But no one has as yet discussed the methods which have led to these results. This I will endeavor to make lucid, though the question is difficult to explain in our modes of debate here.

Any fair proposition must have as its foundation the enumeration of all the people. All are counted, whether black or white. According to the respective numbers of the several States should be our apportionment. Numbers and States are inseparable. Taxation was the constitutional standard or correlation of representation. As is the taxation, so is the apportionment. A State of 10 members out of 300 should not pay one-twenty-ninth or one-thirty-first of the direct tax; but one-thirtieth, and only that. It was a constitutional principle. Delegation of power and control of moneyed income and outgo should move pari passu.

All agreed that we should not fix upon a ratio first, but upon the number of members first.

This was the plan I proposed last session. It is good yet, constitutionally if not scientifically:

After we determine the number of our members, the quota of population for each member and State is easily ascertained by the rule of three. The whole population, omitting Territories and the District of Columbia, is divided by the number of members, and the quotient is the basis of representation for each member. But on the division of the population of the States so as to ascertain the number of members for each State, is there no fraction, no residuum? Certainly. Shall it go unrepresented? No. Such has not been the practice. It is counted. The loss in the number of members caused by the fractions in the several States is compensated for, as near as may be, by assigning to so many States having the largest fractions an additional member each for its fraction, so as to make up the whole number of Representatives.

Any plan counter to this was deemed unfair. This was the nearest practical plan of last session. It was not a perfect plan, for a perfect plan would count every person in each State, and leave no fraction, no one person unrepresented. Such a plan would make our body consist of 49,371,340 members. It would not be much more disorderly and inconvenient than our present House, on some occasions. [Laughter.] Such a Utopia was never dreamed. A plan based on an equal division, such as President Washington thought was the only constitutional plan, would make out of a House of the present number (293) only 271, being 22 less than the present number. This would give four more to the Northern States than to the Southern on the fractions. So that it happens that the fractions depend on the number of the members chosen; and almost as if by lot, the sectional and other qualities of representation are affected. In fact, there might be a greater increase of population South, and yet a relative decrease of power, and vice versa as to the North. All plans, therefore, depend on the number. That number should absorb as much of the residuum as possible; and leave the equality between the sections, States, and districts as nearly perfect as possible. This 307 did. It was a magic number. Northern population, being 62.52 per cent., was represented by 62.54 per cent.; Southern population, being 37.48 per cent., by 37.46 per cent. This was by the old method with 307. I would be content with it yet, but the majority of the House is on a craze for increase.

If you raise the number to 320, the ratio is less, the quotient being 154,285. Now comes the trouble. It is to discover the number of members to be assigned to each State. To do this, divide the population of each State by the quotient or ratio. Mr. Seaton calls this the "modulus." It represents a district, if each and all were exactly equal on a division. On an even division with 320, by the old way, New York would lose 1 from her present number, dropping from 33 to 32; but having a large fraction, 145,751, and being the third in the list of fractions she gains a member, and rises to 33. Rhode Island by the same old mode gains 1 on a fraction of 122,246. Georgia and Nebraska, Tennessee and Ohio, Kentucky and Indiana, Illinois and Virginia, each gain 1; and the gains continue until eighteen States, minus two, Delaware and Nevada, receive 1 member each, so as to make up the 320. Delaware and Nevada not having enough for one member, each get one by the Constitution.

Then we have 36 remainders in as many States by the old method. What are those sixteen States whose fractions are the largest? What is the order in size of these fractions? Tennessee, Georgia, Illinois, New York, Nebraska, Indiana, Virginia, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Florida, Ohio, Kentucky, Michigan, California, Massachusetts, and Iowa. So that five Southern and eleven Northern States gain 1 each on 320 by their superior fractions; and this is nearly in the proportion of their respective populations, though the balance of 1 on 320 is against the South, when it should be otherwise. Under my bill of 307, under the old method, there is an approximation to perfection so near, that in the North there is only two-hundredths of a gain, and in the South a loss of two-hundredths.

Now, take 320 on the new method. What are the changes from the old method? What State gains by the new method alone? What loses? California, Rhode Island, and Florida lose 1 each; Pennsylvania, New York, and Illinois gain 1 each. Calling California and New York doubtful States—by the last election for President—there is a gain of Pennsylvania and Illinois and a loss of Florida and Rhode Island, which cancel; so that that the Republicans make a clear gain by the new method of two new States, which make a difference of two Congressmen and four electoral votes.

Is this the inevitable result of figuring? Yes, taking 320 as the number and the new method.

Suppose you take 316—still California, Florida, and Rhode Island lose; New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania gain—the same partisan result.

Take 307 by the new method. Florida, Nebraska, and Rhode Island lose, while Georgia, Missouri, and New York gain; so that if Florida and Rhode Island cancel, and New York and Georgia cancel each other also, there is but one gain South, namely, that of Missouri. This is by the new method.

If 293 were selected, Connecticut, West Virginia, Nebraska, and Minnesota would lose 1 each; and Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania gain 1 each; so that the Republicans would still gain 2 on the average, if 293 were selected on the new method. Ciphering, as between the old or new methods, is not absolutely helpful to either party, except as you may choose a convenient number.

* If a fair and just measure, as that proposed by Mr. COX appears substantially to be, can be passed at the present session, there are strong reasons why it should be passed. Twenty States are holding biennial sessions of their Legislatures, and are ready to conform their districting to the requirements of the new apportionment. If it is not made now, they will have to hold extra sessions, at considerable expense, for this sole purpose, or the distribution of members under the census of 1880 cannot take effect before the next Congressional elections. On the other hand, there is no good reason for postponement unless the Democratic majority attempts to secure some unfair advantage. This would justly be resisted, but there ought to be no purpose on either side but to secure a fair and equitable apportionment, as strictly as possible on the basis of population, excluding the traditional untaxed Indian.—New York Times.

But as to the gain over the present representation on the several numbers, 307, 316, and 320, on the old method, let this table show:

The gains over the present number by the old method on 307, 316, and 320 are: 1 each in Arkansas, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and West Virginia; and by the new method, the same gain of 1 each in Arkansas, California, Georgia, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, South Carolina, and West Virginia. These latter States are not affected by any ciphering on the present bills on the old method. Nine other States have no losses or gains by the present bills on either method.

The States which gain by the old method over our present number are California, 2 on 316 and 2 on 320; Georgia, 1 on 316 and 1 on 320; Illinois, 1 on 316 and 1 on 320; Iowa, 1 on 307 and 316 and 2 on 320; Kansas, 3 on 307, 316, and 320; Kentucky, 1 on 316 and 320; Massachusetts, 1 on 320; Michigan, 1 on 307 and 2 on 316 and 320; Minnesota, 2 on 307, 316, and 320; Missouri, 1 on 316 and 320; Nebraska, 2 on 307, 316, and 320; Ohio, 1 on 320; and Pennsylvania, 1 on 320.

On the new method, Illinois gains 1 on 316 and 2 on 320; Iowa 1 on 307 and 316 and 2 on 320; Kansas 3 on 307, 316, and 320; Kentucky 1 on 316 and 320; Massachusetts 1 on 320; Michigan 1 on 307 and 2 on 316 and 320; Minnesota 2 on 307 316, and 320; Nebraska 1 on 307 and 2 on 316 and 320; New York 1 on 316 and 320; Ohio 1 on 316 and 320.

The losses by the old method are: Indiana and New York 1 each on 307, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont 1 each on 307 316, and 320.

The losses by the new method are: 1 each in Florida, Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont on 307, 316, and 320, and 1 in Indiana on 307.

Other States do not gain so much on some as on other numbers, even where they do not lose.

By both methods, on 307, 6 are lost; on 316 and 320 only 4. By the new method 5 are lost on 307, 316, and 320.

There is not a great change in mere numbers from the old to the new method. The old method singularly gave 8 members to Alabama in a House of 299, and only 7 in a House of 300; while in a House of 301 the old number, 8, returned. Georgia shows in a House of 306, 10 members; and only 9 in a House of 307; but the lost 1 returns at 308. This indicated that in the old method there was some imperfection in the allotment of the fractions. This no one denies. It is not the question.

By the old plan and new Iowa gains 2, rising from 9 to 11 in a House of 320. By the old plan she gained 1, on a small fraction of 81,765, just beating Wisconsin by about 500 persons. Wisconsin gains none by this fraction, retaining her 8 from 293 up to 321. Thus Iowa has a member for each of her 147,692 inhabitants, and poor Wisconsin a member for 164,457. These losses and gains are given to illustrate the working of the two methods in their results of seeming inequality of distribution of political power.

The new method was said to remedy this inequality by making more evenness in the districts. Taking each of the States and their total population, and dividing it by the ratio or even division, and you obtain a list of the fractions. Thus far, the old way; but when you come to assigning the additional members the new plan does not assign according to the size of the fractions.

The tables show the number of persons for each Representative under various numbers up to 350. In making the additional assignments, under the new plan, it is not the remainders but the resulting number of persons to each member to be counted to make equality.

Not to be unjust, let me insert the new plan from the report of Mr. Seaton:

Taking the allotment made by the bill for 320, under the new plan, it will be found that in the several States, omitting Florida, Rhode Island, Colorado, and Nevada, the ratio of inhabitants to each member is generally not far from the average ratio determined for the whole country. The extremes are 174,786 in Oregon and 146,565 in Illinois. In Colorado the ratio is 194,327; in Florida and Rhode Island it is 269,493 and 276,531, respectively. If another member should be given to each of these two States the ratio in them would fall about 8,000 below the limit reached in any other case.

If the majority in Congress support the bill for 320, there will be a contest between the advocates of the new plan and the advocates of the old, because the adoption of the new plan affects the representation of several States. Comparing the apportionment for a House of 320, under the old and under the new plan, it will be seen that the new plan gives one more member to each of the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, and one less to each of the States of Rhode Island, Florida, and California than the old. It is said that the fairness of the plan should remove all opposition to it, and that the small States which lose under it ought to be satisfied, because each one of them has in the Senate a representation equal to that of the largest State in the Union. It can hardly be expected, however, that these considerations will prevent opposition on the part of Florida, Rhode Island, and California. On the other hand, it is believed that the bill cannot fail to have the warm support of the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, which now cast 79 votes in the House. It is said that in supporting the bill they will be advocating the only equitable distribution which can be made.

This further might have been expected: 1st, that the new method on every possible number of Representatives does gross injustice to every one of twenty-two of the smallest States; 2d, it does not materially affect six medium-sized States; and, 3d, it unjustly aggrandizes the ten largest States.

Result: twenty-two States, with 44 Senators, will defeat this bill in the Senate, if it passes here.

I went zealously to work on the rule of three to make the figures justify the new method.

I asked the reason why, under the language of the Constitution—in apportioning by numbers that ought not to lie—the big States make more than the small, in relative proportion to their numbers?

I desired each State and, if possible, each district to be as near as possible to the modulus. I took a number (297) and found it made another whole district besides one of the little fraction in New York. Why? Because New York saves a larger number for each district, even when she gets one and a half more members.

The same question almost which I put to myself, I find my unsophisticated friend [Mr. SPRINGER] on my left [laughter] asked yesterday of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it more just that Pennsylvania should have 29 districts, with 147,685 inhabitants in each, and that Rhode Island should have 1 district with 276,531 inhabitants; or would it be more just that Pennsylvania should have 28 districts, each having 152,960 inhabitants, and that Rhode Island should have 2 districts, each having 138,256 inhabitants? That is the question. It seems to me that, desiring to approximate, as far as possible, representation according to population, the latter proposition is the more just and equal.

Mr. BAYNE. My friend's inquiry is a misdirected one, and when he made it he had not a proper comprehension of the subject which the new method implies. [Laughter.]

This is the answer. It is the best possible.

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] allow me to ask him a question at this juncture?

Mr. COX, of New York. No, sir; for I do not propose to be interrupted as you were. You got all mixed up as you went along, and I do not propose to have anything of the sort in my speech.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to make your figures plain.

Mr. COX, of New York. Well, you can take them plain or mixed, as you please. [Laughter.] Figures cannot be corrected by a member standing up here on one foot. When you are right in the middle of a complex statement, up jumps an honorable member as if he had sat down unexpectedly on a crooked pin in his seat [laughter] and interrupts you. He commits a classic rape on a cloud of statistics, right in the face of the House.

I found that from 150 to 500 by the new method this aggrandizement of the big States by the diminution of the little ones would go on with increasing and aggravated outrage. This new method plugs up, so to speak, the little end and leaves the big end open wide, and that, as in one case, to prevent going below the modulus 13,000 only, it permitted it to go up 30,000, and greater in other instances hereafter to be noted. Then I called in the best ciphering I could muster, and this is the result. I am indebted to Mr. Charles W. Smiley, a most accomplished statistician, for assisting me in verifying my conclusions. These I state in the following order:

I. WHAT THE NEW METHOD DOES.

The new method claims, and justly, that it forms districts which "fall as little below the average number for the United States as possible." For instance, upon a total number of Representatives of 293 it prevents any district from going below a population of 159,903, excepting of course Delaware and Nevada, which must have one Representative anyway. Under the old method there would be eighteen districts in five States which would have less than 159,903 people. As the ratio for this number (293) is 168,503, it looks very nice to prevent having any districts so far below the ratio in population as the old method carried them. This, then, is the virtue of the new method: it keeps out districts falling more than about 8,000 below the ratio or modulus.

It was this peculiar virtue, Mr. Speaker, that attracted me at first favorably to this new method.

II. HOW THE NEW METHOD PREVENTS DISTRICTS FALLING FAR BELOW THE RATIO.

Could the size of districts be kept up to the ratio, or modulus, without some offsetting disadvantage, the effect would be just what the new method on its face purports to do, but in this it fails. In order to prevent a district going 8,000 or more below the modulus it drives them 10,000, 20,000, 40,000, 80,000, 100,000, and even 108,000 above the ratio or modulus. For example, the number 293 is used (on page 17 of the report of the Superintendent of the Census for 1881) to illustrate the new method. There the new method is exhibited as keeping Minnesota from going down to districts of 156,154 people each, which would each be 12,349 below the ratio. But it does not state, as is true, that it drives the Minnesota districts up to an average of 26,690 above the ratio. It exhibits how to prevent Connecticut from having four districts, each 12,828 below the ratio; but is silent about the fact that it necessitates forming three districts, each 39,063 greater than the ratio. It prevents West Virginia from having four districts running 13,889 below justice by making for her three, which are each 37,649 too large. It cannot permit Nebraska to have three districts averaging 17,703 below the modulus, but it compels her to have two averaging 57,698 above the modulus. It will not permit Rhode Island to have two districts which fall 30,238 below the modulus, but compels her to have one district which exceeds the modulus by 108,028. In this way it rules out an additional Representative from five States, with eighteen districts, averaging 17,401 below the modulus; and compels these States to take up with thirteen districts, each of which districts will average from 26,000 to 108,000 greater than the average district of the United States.

III. HOW THE NEW METHOD AFFECTS THE STATES ACCORDING TO THEIR SIZE

As has already been shown, with the number selected to illustrate its virtues, the new method works harm to five small States by giving them less Representatives and compelling them to have districts far above the legitimate size. And it has also been shown that Rhode Island, the smallest, was treated most unjustly of all. And it is a fact capable of proof that with any total number of Representatives from 275 to 350 all States having 7 or less Representatives, namely, Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Vermont, and West Virginia, will, and must of necessity, fall short of justice under the new method. What those twenty States lose of their just quota will be distributed between Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. These are the eight largest States. The six medium-sized States of Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, Wisconsin, and the States of Delaware and Nevada, given one Representative of necessity, will not be affected very much one way or the other.

IV. HOW MUCH ABSOLUTE INJUSTICE THE NEW METHOD DOES.

No one claims that the old method does precise justice, but that on any and every number from 275 to 350 it comes nearer to justice than the new method. This is abundantly capable of demonstration. At 293, in absolute justice, the States of Minnesota, Connecticut, West Virginia, Nebraska, and Rhode Island should have 16.31 Representatives. The new method gives them 13, 3½ too few. The old method gives them 18, 1⅝ too many. Here is a result twice as far from justice by the new method as by the old. These 3½ Representatives which the new method defrauds—

I used the term, Mr. Speaker, in no unparliamentary sense—the small States of, it distributes so as to make New York have .84 of a Representative more than justice; to Pennsylvania .58, to Ohio .11, to Massachusetts .42, and to Illinois .74 of a Representative more than justice. Which is fairest, which is most magnanimous, to take, as the new method does, 3½ unjustly from five small States with a total representation of 18 at most, and give them to the five large States which have 102 Representatives at the least; or to take, as the old method does, 1⅝ Representatives from five great States and give to five small ones? Which is most just, to make these five great States sacrifice 2 per cent. of their representation, as does the old method; or to make these five small States sacrifice 20 per cent. of their representation, as does the new method?

But 293 was the number selected by the author of the new method to illustrate its virtues. Take some other number at random, say 297, and let us see how do the methods work? This time the small States are Connecticut, Louisiana, Maryland, Minnesota, Nebraska, Rhode Island, and West Virginia which are affected differently by the two methods. If they could have absolute justice, Representatives "according to their respective numbers," as the Constitution demands, they would have 27.63 Representatives. This any one can see by the rule of three. If the 49,371,340 people of the United States have 297 Representatives, then the 4,625,752 people of these seven States should have 27.63 of those Representatives; but as the decimal cannot be made use of in practice any reasonable person will say that those seven States ought to have 28 Representatives. Now see what the two methods say. Turn to page 51 of the report before alluded to. The new method gives these seven States 23 members, 5 short of justice; and the old method gives them 30, 2 more than justice. And what the new method robs these little States of it gives out to Pennsylvania 1.25 beyond its rightful quota, to Ohio nearly 1, and the rest to Alabama, Illinois, New York, and Texas, which States would have 109 Representatives without preying upon other States. Which is the less evil? To take 2.31 from the 111.23 justly belonging to these large States and distribute to the small ones, as does the old method; or to take 4.63 of justice from the seven small States and give to the large, as does the new method? Which is the better: injure great States by 2 per cent. of their representation or small States 17 per cent.?

Or, take a greater number, (327.) Florida, Kansas, Mississippi, New Jersey, Rhode Island, and South Carolina are, in equity, entitled to 31.77 Representatives, nearly 32. Again, the new method defrauds them, bringing them down to 28, while the old method again comes nearer justice by giving them 34. But the amusing thing is that the new method puts upon New York one and a third more than it is in equity entitled to, upon Ohio nearly one too many, and upon Pennsylvania one and two-thirds more Representatives than the rule of three shows its people to be entitled to. Here, as in every other case, the new method works a great per cent. of reduction in representation below absolute justice in small States (12 per cent.) and the old method works 1 per cent. against the large States.

There is a well-defined limit to the amount and kind of variation from absolute equity in the two methods. The new, almost without exception, defrauds small States, and the old usually deprives large States of the benefit of fractions. But the new method systematically, and of necessity from its construction, does always greater injustice, and far greater injustice, than the old method. Additionally, the old strikes at large States and the new at small ones.

Moreover, the new method contains an element, which will be pointed out, whereby the smaller the State the greater the injustice done it, and in exact arithmetical ratio; and in the same manner, the larger the State the more will it profit by what the method robs the small States of. There is no guess-work about this. It is a mathematical law, and any mathematician can see it. It is very strange if the author of the new system has not discovered it, and very unfortunate that he did not see it in time to save putting his method before Congress.

V. THE CAUSE OF THE INJUSTICES OF THE NEW SYSTEM.

It only remains to show how the new system is defective, and what makes it produce such strange results. The method is defective in that it guards very strenuously against small districts, and can place no limit upon large ones. It stops leaks on the small side and leaves the large side wide open. It strains out the gnat and swallows the camel. This fact has been made plain enough. But how does it do it; and why is that a necessity of the system? Simply because it conditions the distribution of what Representatives fail to be allotted at first upon the ability of the States to prevent their average district going very far below the ratio or modulus. In the case of 293 Representatives, both methods agree on allotting the first 273. The final 20 are assigned by the old method, according to the size of remaining fractions. But the new method says: "Give them to the States that can save their districts from falling below 159,903." Now, New York and Connecticut compete. New York had enough people for thirty districts of 168,503 each (the ratio) and 27,781 over. Connecticut had enough for three districts of 168,503 each, and 117,191 over. The new method says: "Which of you can even up your fraction without going below 159,903?" New York levies 4,540 on each of its thirty districts and adds these contributions to its little fraction of 27,781, when it transforms itself into thirty-one districts of 163,963 each. Connecticut, with its big fraction of 117,191 levies on its three districts of 168,503 each for 12,828 each to add to the fraction. The result is that Connecticut's four districts average 155,675 each. Both States now present their results to the new method for its judgment. The new method responds: "I give the additional Representative to New York, because it evened up to 163,963, which is nearer the ratio than Connecticut, which evened up to only 155,675." The new method adds: "I am sorry that I compel Connecticut to distribute its great fraction of 117,191 to the three districts, making them 207,566 each (over 39,000 on the average above the ratio;) but I consider that fairer than to give Connecticut the other member, making its district average 155,675, and to keep New York at thirty Representatives, each representing 169,429 people.

Why has New York transformed her fraction of 27,781 into a district when Connecticut could not transform her 117,191 into a district? Simply and solely because of her size. She had thirty districts on which to levy and they could swell her little fraction with so slight a sacrifice that it was not very injurious to the average. Connecticut's three districts had to supplement the great fraction 177,191 far less in all, but far more individually, and thus fell below the death-line.

There are numbers, 327 for instance, under which a great State like New York or Pennsylvania can even up toward the modulus and transform a small fraction into two Representatives easier than the small State can even up its great fraction enough to save its one man to which it is justly entitled. There is thus a mathematical predetermination in the new method to put small States into an unequal contest solely because they are small. And that results from limiting the variations from the modulus only on the lower side and not on the upper. It is not believed for a moment that the author of the new method contemplated such a cruel plan, but what was rather ingenious in its appearance and formidable in type, when subjected to mathematical analysis has proved a delusion and a snare to small States; and, based upon an unjust principle, is powerless to apportion as the Constitution directs, "according to the respective numbers" of people in the States.

For these reasons, too succinctly stated perhaps for perspicuity, may I not challenge the attention of the conscientious members of this House? Will they, under their light, depart from the plan prepared and adopted with so much heed and study last Congress? As a member from a large State, I disdain to seize any advantage which this unjust new method might give.

When this measure was up in last Congress I endeavored to show that the House was sufficiently if not inordinately large for legislative business. The reasons then given have increased emphasis. For utility and wisdom and comparative freedom from corrupt attack, 300 is more than enough. A basis of 200,000 or 275 members whose ratio is 179,532 would afford a fair chance for full representative ideas and conveniences.

We want efficiency, not numbers. Qualis non quantus. It was argued then by a gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWLEY] that the Senate, with its 76 members, brought more dispatch to business than the House.

If it be said that other assemblies are larger, as in England, France, Italy, Germany, and Hungary, it may be answered that these bodies represent not the people but titles and classes, and are not examples of sobriety and wisdom in their conduct. They do not compare with our State Legislatures, which are less in number than this House.

It is useless to argue the point since you are all eye-witnesses. As well argue that there are colors in yonder escutcheons.

The principal reason urged for the increase and against the reduction of the number of members is: New England and other States will lose in their showing. Such an argument is puerile. There is no loss except relative. No one is reprehensible for the extraordinary growth of certain sections and States. There is no humiliation to Vermont that she loses one while her sons go to the great West and help create new empires, which they come here to represent. Iowa is almost the child of Ohio. If Ohio barely holds her own, is she not represented elsewhere by many of her native-born children; and among them the gentleman, [Mr. McCOID?] As to the loss of sectional strength, I presented the matter plainly last Congress in these words:

Why do not our politicians prepare for the inevitable? Let them compute the past percentages for the relative strength of the sections. They will find that New England fell from 28 per cent. in 1790 to less than 10 per cent. in 1870; that the Middle States since 1820 fell from 32 per cent. to 23 per cent. in 1870, and that the Southern States only fell from 45 per cent. in 1800 to 34.8 per cent. in 1860; while the West and Southwest has bounded from 3 per cent. in 1810 to 31 per cent. in 1870. In 1880 the States along the Mississippi, west and east, have made astounding advancement. The general increase of the country is 30.07 per cent. We are coming to our ante bellum growth. If this rate be continued, we will have 65,000,000 in 1890, 80,000,000 in 1900, and nearly 100,000,000 in 1910. It may not be accurate to say that the Southern States have increased the most, though they seem to have done so, owing to the defective census of 1870. Probably they have. Whether true or not, these divisions of North and South, especially in the West, have lost their significance. In any event, the North continues to exceed the South in Congress, the electoral college, Senate, and population. But the wonderful increase of five States west of the Mississippi is the salient feature of the census. In twenty years they have doubled their numbers, leaping from one-tenth of our whole people to one-fifth. These five States have increased 87.3 per cent. No State east of the Mississippi has attained to 50 per cent., while the Pacific States have gained 58.80 per cent. during the ten years.

When will members forget that the old lines of sectional division are being obliterated? Another decade, and the valley of the Mississippi will have more of unity and homogeneity than the old slave States have to-day. We will not be then less American in spirit and feeling. If gentlemen will be patient, time will do much to heal; it will heal tariff troubles as well, which my friend from Indiana seems to apprehend are hidden in these measures. Every ten years will rectify the growths and losses of our system. Let us be thankful for this peaceful, ordained revolution, moving like the earth "on its soft axle," with happy alternation of grateful night and prolific day, and of the benignant seasons. If the smaller States complain of being overslaughed, we must remember that there is the Senate and the electoral college where their equality is recognized, substantially and potentially. Let them bow gracefully to the inevitable. If larger States, on any number, lose a member each, the Senate by the terms of the Constitution is unalterable for them also, and their voice is that of an equal and of a power. If in other States there is to be an increase, let us proudly remember that it is the increase of the country and of the popular branch which has not always kept pace with the Senatorial increase. It is the growth of our system in all its far-reaching influences by a law greater than the Constitution, which knows "no great and no small." These changes should not be left to chance for their representation. The States should have their equality in both Houses, in the great system we are illustrating for the benefit as well of ourselves as of mankind. So that whether the States be great or small, West or East, North or South, their equality and dignity shall be vindicated—

Self-reverent each, and reverencing each;
Distinct in individuality;
But like each other, even as those who love.

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution requires that there shall be an enumeration of the people once in every ten years, and the tenth census having been taken the duty now devolves upon Congress of reapportioning Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers—a duty both important and difficult. Judge Story says on this subject:

It was proposed to have the census taken once in fifteen years and in twenty years, but the vote finally prevailed in favor of ten. The importance of this provision for a decennial census cannot be overvalued. It is the only effectual means by which the relative power of the several States could be justly represented.

Mr. Webster said, in relation to the apportionment bill of 1832:

It respects the distribution of political power among the States of the Union. It is to determine the number of voices which for ten years to come each State is to possess in the popular branch of the legislature.

It is a difficult duty, because whatever number is proposed, some State will insist that another number would be more favorable to her interests.

The tables that have been prepared and submitted by the Superintendent of the Census render us great assistance in this work. The first duty is to establish a ratio of representation, which should be done in consideration of the number of members of which this House should be composed and of the number of people whom each member should represent. We run between two dangers; on the one hand that of making the House so large as to be unwieldy as a legislative body, and on the other that of making the duties of members too onerous by having districts large in territory and population to represent.

It is wonderful to note the growth of the nation in the light of the changes that have been made in the apportionments under the nine previous censuses and the consequent increase in the membership of this House. I have arranged a table, which will be convenient in showing the population of the United States at each census, the number of members of the House under each, and the several apportionments of Representatives among the States:

Census of—	Population.	1 Representative to—	No. of Representatives.
1790	3,929,214	33,000	105
1800	5,294,390	33,000	141
1810	7,215,858	35,000	181
1820	9,600,783	40,000	213
1830	12,820,868	47,700	240
1840	17,019,641	70,680	223
1850	23,067,262	93,423	237
1860	31,183,744	127,381	243
1880	49,369,595	.....	.....

Thus, from sixty-five members, of which the first House was composed, the number has been increased from decade to decade, until the present House has 293. The question now is whether it shall remain at that number or be increased to 365, or to some intermediate point. Speaking for my own State I should be gratified if it were practicable to determine a basis of representation that would save her present number of Representatives, but arithmetic teaches that this cannot be done unless Congress should adopt the ratio of 1 Representative to 135,259 population, which would give the House 365 members, and Vermont would then get its third Representative only by virtue of a fraction of 63,000. That ratio would not differ largely from the present one, and this House would then be smaller by 165 members than is the Chamber of Deputies in France, and smaller by 287 members than the British House of Commons. A bill has been introduced which provides for 365 members, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] favors a much larger number than that, and votes will doubtless be taken on these respective propositions. But I have mistaken the judgment of the country and of the House if a largely increased number should meet with much favor in any quarter.

Vermont is not to be reproached because she has not made a greater increase in the ten years. She has added to the population and prosperity of other States if not to her own. Attracted by broader and more fertile fields, many of her people have gone to the West, where they have greatly aided in developing the resources, building up the industries and shaping the social and political society of that vast section of our country. We can point to many leading men in the West who first saw the light among the Green Mountains, and I am happy to note the fact that, aside from the delegation from my State, eleven gentlemen who occupy seats on this floor were born in Vermont.

The tables that were prepared by General Walker range only from 293 to 325, and the bills, amendments, and debates in the last Congress were confined within those limits. The bill reported by the minority of the committee, proposing 319 members, finally passed the House.

The present Superintendent of the Census has submitted tables running from 275 to 350; but few gentlemen have attempted to explore the maze of figures that lies beyond the last-named number. It may be urged, however, in favor of the bill to increase the number to 365 that if the membership of the House were increased in the ratio of increase of population of the United States in the last ten years, there would be added 85 members instead of 72, as the bill and amendment propose. But in my judgment the increase in the number of Representatives cannot keep pace with the increase of representative population without the House becoming so large as to be entirely ineffective as a working body, though the time is not far distant when members must either have constituencies of 200,000 or the House must approach the numerical size of the corresponding houses of France and Great Britain.

But the number of members of which the House of Commons consists is no guide for us. Members upon this floor represent widely diverse interests. The gentleman from Colorado represents the mining interests of that rapidly growing State. The gentleman from Nebraska has constantly in view measures that tend to the development of the agricultural industry of a State that receives an influx of 100,000 population in a year. Pennsylvania sends Representatives charged with the duty of protecting her immense interests in iron and coal. Representatives from New York keep vigilant watch over the commercial interests of one of the largest cities of the globe. The cotton industry of the South, the manufacturing industry of the North, the improvement of rivers and harbors to facilitate the transportation of the immense and rapidly increasing products of the country—these are but a few of the leading interests which members of this House are bound to advocate and promote by proper legislation, the promotion of which conduces to the welfare of the nation.

In Great Britain the interests of the country are centralized and controlled directly by the government itself. A member of Parliament can speak for the whole of England, for it is less in extent than the State of Illinois. The entire area of Great Britain, whose House of Commons is more than twice as large as this House, is less than that of California, which is struggling to secure six Representatives. It follows that a few leaders can and do direct legislation, while the large majority of the members content themselves with voting, and are usually absent from the sessions except on occasions when their votes are required. Such a house may well be large numerically, but practically it is small. In this country such a house would be impracticable. No man, even though he had the learning and the eloquence of a Gladstone, could, in the English sense, be the leader of this House; and members, with American ideas, never would submit to the leadership of one man or of any set of men. Here every member must be a leader in the sense of representing the interests of his own constituency.

Any increase of constituencies is somewhat appalling to many members, especially those from the newer portions of the country, for they are now greatly burdened by duties growing out of the wants of their districts. It would be a most happy end to attain if members of Congress could be measurably relieved from the recommendations to office, the multitudinous small duties in the Departments of the Government, and their endless correspondence, and be able to devote themselves entirely to the study of the science of government and the measures before Congress. Appointments to the civil service upon intelligent examinations would relieve them of a portion of their burdens, but there is no prospect of relief from their other duties. Constituents naturally and reasonably look to their Representatives to attend to their various wants at the capital, and those demands are answered with cheerfulness and alacrity, although nearly the whole time outside of the sitting hours of the House, and often those hours, are occupied for this purpose. It is a subject of regret to many members that, for their own credit and the honor of their constituents, they have not more time for study and for the work of legislation.

The bill that has been reported by the Committee on the Census, of which I have the honor to be a member, increases the membership of the House to 320. If the entire representative population of the United States (49,369,595) was to be equally divided by that number it would give a population of 154,285 to each Representative. The difficulty arises when, having adopted the ratio of 1 member to 154,285 people, we attempt to measure the population of each State by the rule thus obtained. For example, the population of the State of New York divided by 154,285 gives a quotient of 32, and a fraction of 145,751 remains, which lacks only 8,534 of entitling that State to another Representative. The population of each State divided in the same manner gives quotients amounting to only 302, which is 18 less than the 320 Representatives required, leaving fractions varying in size from 1,317, as in West Virginia, to 153,794, as in Tennessee, which fractions aggregate, in all the States, 2,777,270.

Following the method adopted under the census of 1870, resort would be had to the eighteen States having the largest fractions, which would give the following States each one additional Representative on the fractions set against their names:

Missouri	153,794
Georgia	153,615
Illinois	146,456
New York	145,751
Nebraska	143,832
Indiana	126,881
Virginia	124,000
Rhode Island	122,246
Pennsylvania	117,196
Florida	115,208
Ohio	112,362
Kentucky	105,840
Michigan	94,087
California	93,269
Massachusetts	85,950
Iowa	81,765

In debate gentlemen often speak of fractional districts and unrepresented fractions, bnt of course neither exist in fact. When a given State has 11 Representatives, and, on account of its large fractions is entitled to another, it is divided then into twelve districts as nearly equal in population as convenient; and when any State has a residue after division for which it does not obtain another Representative, the entire population would be divided among the districts.

Mr. Speaker, I regret not to be able to concur with my committee in its adoption of the "new method," as it is called. The old method, which has heretofore been adopted, does not always do exact justice. For instance, when we resort to the eighteen States that have the largest fractions to make up the deficit, we are compelled to pass by the nineteenth, although its fraction might chance to be almost as large as the eighteenth. But the line must be drawn somewhere, and, on the whole, I believe it more equally and equitably apportions the Representatives among the people of the States than any other method that can be devised. The old method I have explained. The new method proceeds in like manner to divide the entire representative population of the United States by the number of Representatives required, say 320, as proposed by the committee's bill, which gives a quotient of 154,285, making a ratio of 1 member to that number of people. This quotient is a new divisor by which the population of each State is divided; and, as in the other method, it gives 302 members. How is the deficit made up by the new method? We ascertain from the table how many members each State is entitled to, if all the States are entitled to 302, and we divide the population of each State by this number increased by one. For instance, at 302 for all the States, Massachusetts would have 11 members. Then add 1 to 11 and divide the population of Massachusetts by 12 and we have a quotient of 148,590. In like manner we divide the population of each State and give to the eighteen States, whose quotients come the nearest to 154,285 each an additional member to make up the deficit.

I have great respect for the Superintendent of the Census, and I have no criticism to make upon his method as a mathematical calculation. In its practical application, however, it seems to me clearly to discriminate against the small States and in favor of the large ones. I cannot better illustrate the injustice of its operation than by this proposition: that a small divisor, by the addition of one to it, is increased far more in power than a large divisor by the same addition. Thus:

The population of California divided by 5 is	172,938
Divided by 6 it is	144,115
Difference	28,823
Population of Illinois divided by 20 is	153,893
Divided by 21 it is	146,565
Difference	7,328
Population of Rhode Island to 1 Representative is	276,531
To 2 Representatives, each	138,265
Difference	138,266
Population of New York divided by 33 is	154,026
Divided by 34 is	149,496
Difference	4,530
Population of Florida to 1 Representative is	269,493
To 2 Representatives, each	134,746
Difference	134,747
Population of Pennsylvania divided by 28 is	152,960
Divided by 29	147,685

One added to the divisor for Rhode Island increases its power 100 per cent., while 1 added to the divisor for New York increases its power only 3 per cent. I am aware it is claimed that it is more equitable for Pennsylvania to have 29 Representatives with 147,685 population each than that Florida should have 2 Representatives with only 134,146 population each. The answer is obvious. With 29 Representatives to Pennsylvania, each has a population of 6,600 less than the average or ratio for the United States, which, multiplied by 29 gives 137,940 people who, if I may use an expressive though not an accurate term, would be overrepresented; or, in other words, there would be Representatives for that number of people who do not exist, while Rhode Island, to use a corresponding expression, would have 122,246 people unrepresented.

Again, on a ratio of 1 Representative to 154,288 population, Illinois gets her twentieth Representative by virtue of her fraction of 146,456, and yet this method gives her 21. New York gets her thirty-third on a fraction of 145,751, and this method gives her 34. Pennsylvania gets her twenty-eighth on a fraction of 117,196, and yet she is allowed 29. California, on an even division, has 5 Representatives, and with a fraction of 93,269 is refused an additional one. Rhode Island has 1 Representative, and, with a fraction of 122,246, is refused another. Florida has 1 Representative, and, with her fraction of 115,208, is refused a second. This is manifestly unjust.

Permit me to state it in still another way. At 320 the ratio is 1 Representative to 154,285 persons. Under this method Illinois would have 21 members with 146,565 population each, 7,720 less than the average; New York, 34, with 152,960 population each, 1,325 less than the average; Pennsylvania, 29, with 147,685 each, 6,600 less than the average or ratio. On the other hand, California would have 93,269, Rhode Island, 122,246, Florida, 115,208 more than the average or ratio, and each is refused another Representative. Certainly this cannot be apportioning Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers in pursuance of the constitutional requirement.

It must be borne in mind that on an apportionment of 320 Representatives the result would be the same in thirty-two States under each method. The change in system only affects six States. For convenience I have placed them in the following table in order to exhibit the relative population to a Representative under each system:

NEW SYSTEM.

Pennsylvania, 29 Representatives, with 147,685 population to each.
Illinois, 21 Representatives, with 146,565 population to each.
New York, 33 Representatives, with 149,496 population to each.
Florida, 1 Representative, with 269,493 population.
Rhode Island, 1 Representative, with 276,531 population.
California, 5 Representatives, with 172,938 population to each.

OLD SYSTEM.

Pennsylvania, 28 Representatives, with 162,960 population to each.
Illinois, 20 Representatives, with 153,893 population to each.
New York, 33 Representatives, with 154,026 population to each.
Florida, 2 Representatives, with 134,746 population.
Rhode Island, 2 Representatives, with 138,265 population.
California, 6 Representatives, with 144,115 population to each.

Thus it will be seen that by the new method the districts in the six States affected vary in size from 146,565 to 276,531, a difference of 129,966 between the smallest and the largest. The average population in the districts in the three gaining States is 147,915; in the three losing States, 239,656, a difference of 91,741.

By the old method the districts in the six States vary in size only from 134,746 to 173,495, a difference of 38,749 between the smallest and the largest. The average in the three large States is 153,626, in the three small States 139,042.

Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored fairly and fully to set before the House these two systems of apportionment. If I have in any manner misrepresented them, it has been unintentional on my part, and I am sure to be corrected by my friends and associates on the committee, [Mr. BAYNE and Mr. MCCOID,] who have given this subject careful consideration. In view of the ability which they and other gentlemen upon the committee have brought to this subject and the study they have bestowed upon it I should greatly distrust my own conclusions if their correctness did not seem so nearly established by actual demonstration.

But if I understand my friends correctly they do not adhere strictly to Colonel Seaton's method. They are not governed by a modulus or common divisor, but proceed to assign the Representatives to the respective States upon a kind of trial sheet. They first set down Alabama and assign her 8 Representatives as her probable share of 320. When they come to Illinois they assign her 21, New York 34, Pennsylvania 29, and so on through the list, with an average population to each as before stated; and if the sum of these assignments is 320, the list is assumed to be correct. But I submit to the House that an apportionment cannot be correctly made in this way. How can it be known that Alabama's apportionment is 8 except by the fact that 8 bears substantially the same ratio to the population of that State that 320 bears to the entire representative population of the United Sates? The clause in the Constitution is as follows:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers;

To which Mr. Webster declared there should be added, by fair implication, the words, "as near as may be." They cannot be apportioned with perfect accuracy for the reason that there is no common divisor which, applied to the population of the several States, will divide them exactly without a remainder, as has been shown, but it must be done with as much accuracy as is possible. Mr. Jefferson, in his opinion upon the apportionment bill of 1792, construed this clause of the Constitution to mean that the apportionment should be made by some common ratio, and declared that the nearest common divisor must be taken as that ratio. He held that fractions should be disregarded. Mr. Webster, in his elaborate and, of course, learned report to the Senate, in 1832, said:

Let the rule be, that the population of each State shall be divided by a common divisor, and that, in addition to the number of members resulting from such division, a member shall be allowed to each State whose fraction exceeds a moiety of the divisor.

Judge Story lays down the same rule.

It is true that the Constitution says nothing about districts. It does not direct how many people shall stand behind each Representative. It leaves all that to the States where it of right belongs. It leaves it to them to make their districts of equal or unequal numerical size, or to elect all their Representatives at large, in their discretion. Districts are of State origin and for State convenience, about which the Constitution is silent. But it does declare how many Representatives each State shall have relatively to the whole number of which the House is composed. If 320, then that number shall be divided into thirty-eight parts, one part to each State, each part to bear the same relation to the population of its State that the whole number bears to the aggregate population of all the States. Therefore, I maintain that a distribution of Representatives without the guidance of a common divisor is unconstitutional and incorrect. If such an apportionment should chance to be correct, it would be because a common divisor had been, though unconsciously, employed.

I again ask the attention of the House to the proposed apportionment by the new method. Alabama has 8 Representatives, with an average population of 157,813, very near the average for the aggregate population for all the States. But Illinois has 21, with an average population of 146,565, when 20 with an average population of 153,893 is a little below, but nearer, the general average. New York has 34, with an average population of 149,496, when 33 with an average of 154,026 is very near the general average; and Pennsylvania has 29 with an average of 147,685, when 28 with an average of 152,960 is a little below, but much nearer, the general average; while California, Florida, and Rhode Island are respectively assigned Representatives whose average population is far above the common divisor for the whole population of the United States, as has been before shown.

Sir, it makes a great difference to Florida, with her large area, and to busy Rhode Island, with her great manufacturing and other interests, whether they have one or two Representatives each, and it makes a great difference to California, with her interests extending over an area of a hundred and sixty thousand square miles, whether she is represented on this floor by five members or by six; but to Illinois, Pennsylvania, and New York, who already have large delegations here, it can make but little difference whether they are re-enforced by one or two members each. Therefore, it is the duty of Congress to guard the interests of the smaller States with watchful care, and not reduce their representation unless compelled by a mathematical necessity, which does not now exist.

I do not intend to discuss at any length the matter of the number of which the House shall be composed upon a reapportionment of Representatives, but to leave that upon the recommendation of the committee. If the new method is to be adopted I approve of the number 320. If the distribution is to be made by the former method then we must inquire whether or not any other number could be apportioned with greater equality to all the States. It will be apparent to any one on an examination of the tables that not only the number of Representatives to be obtained on an equal division of the population of each State depends on the divisor or number of people for each Representative, but that the size of the fractions remaining, and consequently the States that will be entitled to an additional Representative each, on account of their fraction, depend on the divisor employed. That is to say, different States gain by virtue of large fractions upon each different ratio of apportionment.

In our deliberations and votes upon this measure we have nothing to do with any other subject than numbers as they appear by the census. No one can seriously claim that the distribution should be made according to the number of votes cast at any elections in the several States. That would plainly violate both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. As perfect equality cannot be secured, we should adopt a ratio that will operate the most justly to all the States. I have made the following table, condensed from those furnished by the Superintendent of the Census, to show the gain and loss of the different States upon a reapportionment at 293, 307, 316, 319, 320, 322, and 325, by the old system. This is followed by tables which show how the figures would be varied by the new system.

By the old system Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Nevada, Oregon, and Rhode Island would not be affected by an apportionment of any number from 293 to 350.

By the new method the foregoing table would be changed as follows:

At 293, Connecticut, Minnesota, Nebraska, Rhode Island, West Virginia, each has 1 less; Illinois, Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, each has 1 more. At 307, Florida, Nebraska, Rhode Island, each has 1 less; Georgia, Missouri, New York, each has 1 more; at 316, California, Florida, Rhode Island, each has 1 less; New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, each has 1 more. At 319, California, Florida, Rhode Island, each has 1 less; Iowa, New York, Pennsylvania, each has 1 more. At 320, California, Florida, Rhode Island, each has 1 less; Illinois, New York, Pennsylvania, each has 1 more. At 322, California, Florida, Kansas, Rhode Island, each has 1 less; Illinois, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, each has 1 more. At 325, California, Florida, Kansas, Rhode Island, South Carolina, each has 1 less; Illinois, Missouri, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, each has 1 more than by the old method.

Mr. Speaker, this subject should be kept above politics and sectionalism, and therefore no number should be adopted which specially favors any section of the country. At present the twenty-two Northern States have 187 and the sixteen Southern States 106 Representatives. On a reapportionment at 293 the two sections would have 185 and 108, respectively. At 307 the Southern States would have 9 of the 14 additional members; at 316, 13 of the 23 additional members. At 319 the two sections gain alike. After that the balance tips the other way. At 320 the Northern States have 14 of the 27 additional members; at 322, 16 of the 29, and at 325, 17 of the 32. It is not claimed that the apportionment under the census of 1870 was not fairly made as respects the two sections. If so, there is no reason why the southern section should have a majority of the increase of members when her increase in population in the ten years has been 4,626,590, against 6,587,500 increase in the North.

If I should be able to obtain the floor at a later stage of this debate I desire to make some further remarks on the subject of the number of members. At this time I rose for the special purpose of discussing the method of distribution recommended by the committee, and to assign reasons for my dissent therefrom.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. TYLER] for his courtesy. If my time was not so limited I should be glad to examine some of the provisions of this bill more at length than it will now be possible to do. It seems to me so objectionable that it cannot be fully characterized by any language which would be strictly parliamentary. But its full discussion is the less important from the fact that it is not, in my judgment, at all likely to be indorsed by this House.

Mr. HAZELTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope we may have order, that the gentleman may be better heard.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I know members are somewhat tired of this bill, and it is late in the day, but I have often patiently listened to some members who are now out of order when they were making as poor speeches as this, and that is saying a good deal. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it is only to a single point that I shall call attention. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRESCOTT,] who is chairman of the Census Committee, and who introduced this bill, vaunted the wealth of his State as a reason for her increased representation. He tells us that New York holds $210,264,250 of the nation's bonds and one-fifth of the bank capital of the United States. That the assessed value of her taxable property is $2,686,139,133, and that her citizens hold nearly three-fourths of the gold certificates of the country, and pay $17,233,393 of internal revenue. He then says:

> Am I to be met with the claim that wealth, the sinew for the support of the Government and her bulwark of defense, counts nothing in representation? That such was not the design of the founders of the Constitution is self-evident. Taxation and representation they considered joint factors in their blows for freedom.

Mr. Speaker, it is to vindicate the truth of history and to refute this aspersion on the work and the fame of that august convention which framed our Constitution that I have asked the attention of the House. In that convention three times was the suggestion to make property or wealth the basis of representation brought forward, and every time and promptly was it as significantly repudiated as this bill will be by this House. [Applause.]

On the 5th of July, 1787—when the convention met after a two days' adjournment to celebrate the 4th—Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, moved this proposition:

> That the suffrages of the several States be regulated and proportioned according to the sums paid toward the general revenue by the inhabitants of each State respectively, and that an apportionment of suffrages, according to the rule aforesaid, shall be made, &c.

Mr. Rutledge advocated the plan. He said:

> Property was certainly the principal object of society, and if numbers should be made the rule of representation, the Atlantic States would be subjected to the Western.

The proposition was brought to a vote. The voting was by States. South Carolina voted aye. Nine States voted no—Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina; Georgia was absent; and it is but justice to say that Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, was opposed to the principle, but the majority of delegates from that State favored it. On two other occasions it was brought before the convention, but never again came to a vote, so strong was the opposition to it. On the 9th of June, 1787, when this matter and the relative power of the States was under discussion, Mr. Patterson, of New Jersey, made the following striking argument. He said:

> There is no more reason that a great individual State, contributing much, should have more votes than a small one, contributing little, than that a rich individual citizen should have more votes than an indigent one. If the taxable property of A was to that of B as forty to one, ought A for that reason to have forty times as many votes as B? Such a principle would never be admitted, and if it were admitted would put B entirely at the mercy of A. As A has more to be protected than B, so he ought to contribute more for the common protection. The same may be said of a large State, which has more to be protected than a small one. Give the large States an influence in proportion to their magnitude, and what will be the consequence? Their ambition will be proportionately increased and the small States will have everything to fear.

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the action and such the language of the framers of our Constitution. Though they had lived under the influences of an aristocratic Government, the true principles of republican liberty seemed to come to them as a revelation. On the question of a property qualification for voters, Colonel Mason, of Virginia, said:

> We all feel too strongly the remains of ancient prejudices, and view things too much through a British medium. A freehold is the qualification in England, and hence it is imagined to be the only proper one. The true idea, in my opinion, is, that every man having evidence of attachment to, and permanent common interest with, society, ought to share in all its rights and privileges.

A century of freedom and progress finds many Americans far behind these great founders of our liberties in a just appreciation of republican principles, although they were then untried in the world. After our Constitution had been framed, its principles were ably and boldly advocated. In the fifty-seventh number of the Federalist, Madison, speaking of the qualifications of voters and Representatives, says:

> Who are to be the electors of the Federal Representatives? Not the rich more than the poor; not the learned more than the ignorant; not the haughty heirs of distinguished names more than the humble sons of obscurity and unpropitious fortune. Who are to be the objects of popular choice? Every citizen whose merits may recommend him to the esteem and confidence of his country. No qualification of wealth or birth or religious faith or civil profession is permitted to fetter the judgment or disappoint the inclination of the people.

These facts of history fully attest the views and the spirit of the men who framed our Government. Let us follow these true lights now as best we may in all our work. If we do we shall hear no claim for power in any measure of wealth or bonds or bank stock or gold certificates. New York is a grand State. Throned in beauty, with one foot on the inland seas and one upon the ocean, she is indeed an "Empire State." But it is her people and not her wealth by which she is to be measured in this "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

Mr. Speaker, there are many objections to this bill which my time forbids to name. It is unjust to the small States; it is unjust to the States whose population is rapidly increasing. This mysterious and misleading modulus is itself an error and a source of confusion instead of a means of truth and accuracy. It is founded upon a false basis. In a great measure like this our only aim should be equality and justice—above all, the full recognition of the equality of every citizen in all his rights as a man and not as a child of fortune or of poverty. The spirit of the age in all free lands has as its most marked characteristic the recognition of the individual and sacred manhood of every human being. I trust this bill, which touches the highest rights of every citizen of the United States, will be based on that principle.

Mr. TYLER. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS.]

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I certainly should not trespass upon the time of the House for a moment at this late hour were it not for the fact that I have submitted an amendment to the committee's bill, upon which amendment I desire to submit some observations. I shall not address myself to the bill of the committee, drawn upon what is declared to be the "new plan," for I am constrained to believe from the reception it has received that it cannot command the support of the committee itself, much less the approval of the House. However scientific the "plan" may be upon which this bill is drawn, however sustained by argument or adorned by rhetoric, when the "plan" is applied to the work before us the results are so startling and the proportions so unseemly that they offend the taste and good judgment of this House.

The Constitution of the United States in its fourteenth amendment declares—

> That Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State.

We are dealing to-day with States; with the question of apportioning the representative power of the nation among the several States in obedience to the requirements of the Constitution. It is a plain constitutional command; and the only question before us is as to the manner in which this command shall be executed to satisfy the requirements of that instrument.

For the purpose of illustrating what I have to say, I have taken 321 as the number which shall constitute the House of Representatives. In other words, my amendment declares or assumes that the representative power of the House shall be 321. Now, the Constitution requires us to apportion that representative power of 321 among the several States according to the population of the several States. When we take 321 or any other number there is not the slightest difficulty in determining to a fraction just the proportion of representative power belonging to each State. That can be arrived at with mathematical accuracy.

Take the population of the United States at 49,371,340, and a representation of 321, then the ratio is 153,805. Dividing the population of each State by this ratio and carry it out decimally we shall have, not a guess, not an uncertain result, but we shall have the exact political or representative power to which each State is entitled.

I hold in my hand a table, which I shall take the liberty to print with my remarks, showing the exact proportion of political or representative power to which each State is entitled, assuming the aggregate number of Representatives to be 321.

Population of United States 49,371,340; number of Representatives 321; ratio 153,805.

Upon this basis the representative power to which Alabama is entitled is 8 Representatives and .20 of a Representative—no more and no less. Arkansas would be entitled to 5.21 Representatives, California to 5.62, New York to 33.04, Illinois to 20.01, and so on, as disclosed by the above table.

Now if it were possible to assign Illinois 20 Representatives and .01 of a Representative, to New York 33.04 of a Representative—if we were able to assign these decimal fractions of representative power—we would comply with the mandate of the Constitution exactly, for these fractions, as I have said, represent the exact representative power belonging to each State.

But there we encounter our first difficulty in carrying out the requirements of the Constitution. Indeed the Constitution imposes upon us an utter impossibility. Its commands cannot be executed. Take Alabama for instance, there is no difficulty in ascertaining what her proportion of Representative power is; for it is exactly 8.20, but you cannot assign her .20 of a Representative. That cannot be done, and the same difficulty arises in all the States, as will be seen by examining the above table. What course must be pursued? But two ways are open to us. Leave off all fractions entirely, and allow representation simply for whole numbers. But that would be doing some States very great injustice.

Virginia is entitled mathematically to 9.83 Representatives; and it would be doing her a wrong to leave the .83 unrepresented. Pennsylvania is entitled in exact figures to 27.84 Representatives; and it would work a hardship to her if the .84 should be unrepresented. Tennessee is entitled to 9.99 of this representative power; and it would be a grievous hardship to her to allow her only 9 members. Ohio is entitled to share 20.79 of this representative power; and it would not be just to deny her representation for this large fraction. Nebraska is entitled to 2.94 Representatives; and it would be wronging her to throw out the .94. So with Indiana, and all the States having a fraction of representative power above a half.

Now, what are we to do in view of the manifest injustice of this course? My theory is that we should distribute this residuum of power among the several States upon some principle which will most nearly satisfy the spirit of the constitutional requirement that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their population."

Mr. Everett, in discussing this same proposition in the House of Representatives in 1832, made use of the following forcible and convincing language:

The remedy of the second evil is sought by the amendment in the application of the following principle, namely, to give to each State that number of Representatives which comes nearest to its exact mathematical share, in strict fulfillment of the letter of the Constitution that Representatives shall be apportioned according to numbers. It is known to be impossible to distribute them exactly in proportion to numbers, but the amendment in each case gives that number of Representatives which comes nearest to mathematical exactness. What principle can be more equitable? What other can be constitutional? There are but three kinds of apportionment conceivable—an apportionment mathematically exact, one making the nearest possible approach to mathematical exactness, and one not making the nearest possible approach to such exactness. The first is out of the question, the second is that of the amendments, and the third that of the bill. And did not the fact teach us the reverse, we should think it incredible that it would not be deemed an adequate objection to the bill that it does not make an apportionment as nearly approaching as possible to mathematical accuracy.

The amendment I propose, which fixes the number of Representatives at 321, if you will recur to the table, proceeds upon the plan of determining the exact representative power to which each State is entitled; and then deny to each State a Representative where the fraction of power is less than one-half, but to every fraction greater than one-half award a member. This plan is the nearest approach to exactness. It comes the nearest to fulfilling the demands of the Constitution. By doing that, allowing a member for every ratio above .50 and withholding one for every ratio below .50, it will be seen that the number assumed 321. While this is not exact justice, I claim it is more nearly exact and more fully meets the requirements of the Constitution than the bill before the House or any other number I have been able to examine.

Now, as we cannot assign to Alabama, to illustrate, 8 Representatives and .20 of a member, which is the nearest approach to exactness, to give her 9 or 8? Clearly 8. And so you can go through the table I have presented and determine at a glance what is nearest right. Take New York, to illustrate. She is entitled under my amendment to 33.04 of a Representative. Is it not more just to give her 33 than 34? Take California; she is entitled to 5.60. Give her 6, because you more nearly satisfy the demands of the Constitution. Wisconsin is entitled to 8.52. Give her 9, because it more nearly approaches the demands of the Constitution.

And here, if you will pardon me, I desire to read from a speech of Mr. Webster on this very question, delivered in 1832. In discussing this same proposition (and his views upon a constitutional question will come home with great force to any body of men) he says, after quoting the constitutional provision:

There would seem to be little difficulty in understanding these provisions. The terms used are designed, doubtless, to be received in no peculiar or technical sense, but according to their common and popular acceptation. To apportion is to distribute by right measure, to set forth in just parts, to assign in due and proper proportion. These clauses of the Constitution respect not only the portions of power, but the portions of the public burden also, which should fall to the several States; and the same language is applied to both. Representatives are to be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, and direct taxes are to be apportioned by the same rule. The end aimed at is, that representation and taxation should go hand in hand; that each State should be represented in the same extent to which it is made subject to the public charges by direct taxation.

But between the apportionment of Representatives and the apportionment of taxes there necessarily exists one essential difference. Representation founded on numbers must have some limit, and being, from its nature, a thing not capable of indefinite subdivision it cannot be made precisely equal. A tax, indeed, cannot always or often be apportioned with perfect exactness; as in other matters of account, there will be frequently parts of the smallest coins and the smallest denomination of money of account; yet, by the usual subdivisions of the coin and of the denominations of money, the apportionment of taxes is capable of being made so exact that the inequality becomes minute and invisible. But representation cannot be thus divided. Of representation there can be nothing less than one Representative; nor by our Constitution more Representatives than one for every 30,000. It is quite obvious, therefore, that the apportionment of a representative power can never be precise and perfect. There must always exist some degree of inequality. Those who framed and those who adopted the Constitution were, of course, fully acquainted with this necessary operation of the provision.

In the Senate the States are entitled to a fixed number of Senators; and, therefore, in regard to their representation in that body there is no consequential or incidental inequality. But, being represented in the House of Representatives according to their respective numbers of people, it is unavoidable that, in assigning to each State its number of members, the exact proportion of each, out of a given number, cannot always or often be expressed in whole numbers; that is to say, it will not often be found that there belongs to a State exactly one-tenth or one-twentieth or one-thirtieth of the whole House; and, therefore, no number of Representatives will exactly correspond with the right of such State or the precise share of representation which belongs to it according to its population.

The Constitution, therefore, must be understood, not as enjoining an absolute relative equality, because that would be demanding an impossibility, but as requiring of Congress to make the apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers as near as may be. That which cannot be done perfectly must be done in a manner as near perfection as can be. If exactness cannot from the nature of things be attained, then the nearest practicable approach to exactness ought to be made.

Congress is not absolved from all rule merely because the rule of perfect justice cannot be applied. In such a case approximation becomes a rule; it takes the place of that other rule which would be preferable, but which is found inapplicable, and becomes itself an obligation of binding force. The nearest approximation to exact truth or exact right, when that exact truth or that exact right cannot itself be reached, prevails in other cases, not as a matter of discretion, but as an intelligible and definite rule, dictated by justice and conforming to the common sense of mankind; a rule of no less binding force in cases to which it is applicable, and no more to be departed from, than any other rule or obligation.

The committee understand the Constitution as they would have understood it if it had said in so many words that Representatives should be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers as near as may be. If this be not its true meaning then it has either given on this most delicate and important subject a rule which is always impracticable, or else it has given no rule at all; because if the rule be that Representatives shall be apportioned exactly according to numbers, it is impracticable in every case; and if for this reason that cannot be the rule then there is no rule whatever, unless the rule be that they shall be apportioned as near as may be. This construction, indeed, which the committee adopt, has not, to their knowledge, been denied; and they proceed in the discussion of the question before the Senate, taking for granted that such is the true and undeniable meaning of the Constitution.

Further on in the same debate he uses the following forcible language:

When the whole number of the proposed House is thus ascertained and fixed, it becomes the entire representative power of all the people in the Union. It is then a very simple matter to ascertain how much of this representative power each State is entitled to by its numbers. If, for example, the House is to contain 240 members, then the number 240 expresses the representative power of all the States and a plain calculation readily shows how much of this power belongs to each State. This portion, it is true, will not always nor often be expressed in whole numbers, but it may always be precisely exhibited by a decimal form of expression. If the portion of any State be seldom or never one exact tenth, one exact fifteenth, or one exact twentieth, it will still always be capable of precise decimal expression, as one-tenth and two-hundredths, one-twelfth and four-hundredths, one-fifteenth and six-hundredths, and so on. And the exact portion of the State being thus decimally expressed, will always show, to mathematical certainty, what integral number comes nearest to such exact portion. For example, in a House consisting of 240 members, the exact mathematical proportion to which her numbers entitle the State of New York, is 38.59; it is certain, therefore, that 39 is the integral or whole number nearest to her exact proportion of the representative power of the Union. Why, then, should she not have 39? And why should she have forty?

It seems that New York was then seeking by some plan to secure 40 members, instead of her just proportion, 39.

But I continue to read from this same speech:

She is not quite entitled to 39; that number is something more than her right. But allowing her 39, from the necessity of giving her whole numbers, and because that is the nearest whole number, is not the Constitution fully obeyed when she has received the thirty-ninth member? Is not her proper number of Representatives then apportioned to her, as near as may be? And is not the Constitution disregarded when the bill goes further and gives her a fortieth member? For what is such a fortieth member given? Not for her absolute numbers, for her absolute numbers do not entitle her to 39. Not for the sake of apportioning her members to her numbers as near as may be, because 39 is a nearer apportionment of members to numbers than 40. But it is given, say the advocates of the bill, because the process which has been adopted gives it. The answer is: No such process is enjoined by the Constitution.

Mr. BAYNE. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan a question here?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Not now, I have but little time.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to ask a question in this connection. Will my friend tell me, or can he answer this question: Whether that method which for instance puts in Pennsylvania 147,865 back of each Representative is not more fair than if we should put 152,960 back of each Representative, when another——

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I cannot yield for a speech.

Mr. BAYNE. Just a moment. When another method will put back of a Representative from California 144,115 only——

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I will answer my friend——

Mr. BAYNE. Let me finish my question.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I cannot yield. I understand the point to which my friend is coming. I answer that any plan, I do not care what it is or how highly it is recommended, that does so great an injustice as this bill proposes is utterly wrong. Pennsylvania under the Constitution is entitled—if you make her representation on the basis of 321—to exactly 27.84 of representative power, and she entitled to no more than that—not a fraction of power more. She is entitled to 27 Representatives on this floor and .84 additional. Now, when my amendment to this bill proposes to give Pennsylvania 28 members we give her .16 of a man more than she is entitled to under the Constitution, and there is no escape from the truth of the assertion.

But your bill goes even further than that. You give her not only this additional fraction of a member but you accord her another full Representative, making a total of 29, in defiance of all law, reason, or justice. Now, upon what principle of constitutional law or equity can you do that?

Mr. BAYNE. That is a perfectly logical conclusion arrived at from erroneous premises.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. It is a conclusion arrived at by an absolutely mathematical calculation. Pennsylvania has no right with any more than 27.84 of representative power on this floor. That is exactly what she is entitled to, and when we grant her 28 members we make a concession to her, and give her representation for a population she does not have or claim to possess. But when Pennsylvania asks instead of that 29 members, she demands that which is beyond all reason and judgment. Now, one thing more, and I shall detain the House but a short time. You will find by consulting the table that on the basis of 321 California is awarded 6 Representatives, the reason being because she is entitled to 5.62, and 6 is the nearest approach to exactness.

I desire to say, in conclusion, that the amendment which I have offered fixing the total number at 321 affects only seven States. It gives, as I have shown, to California 1 additional member, because of her fraction above .50. It gives Florida what she is entitled to for the same reason. It gives Rhode Island and Wisconsin what they are entitled to. It takes from Illinois, New York, and Pennsylvania what they are neither entitled to nor what this House will ever accord. The bill of the committee gives California, with its 5.61, but 5 members. It gives to Florida 1, to which she is entitled, and although she has .74 over, it does not propose to grant her another member for that. But Illinois, which is entitled to 19.96, is accorded but 20, the full measure of her right, but this bill says give her 21. To New York, which is entitled to 32.89, of a Representative, the bill accords 34 members. To Pennsylvania, which is entitled to 27.75, the bill assigns 29. Wisconsin receives 8, although entitled to 9.

Mr. MOORE. What does Tennessee get?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Tennessee, under the bill of the committee, is entitled to 9.99, and is accorded 10 members.

Mr. MOORE. What does she get under your amendment?

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. She will get 10.

Here I will ask to insert a table based on the number proposed by the committee, showing the representative power to which each State is entitled and the number assigned to each State by the bill.

Population of United States, 49,371,340; ratio, 154,285; number of Representatives, 320.

In further illustration of the injustice of this bill, take California. The bill assigns to California but 5 Representatives. That requires to elect a Representative in California 172,938 inhabitants. You give Rhode Island 1 Representative, and you require 276,531 people to elect a member from that State; and 269,493 to elect a member from Florida. And yet, under this bill, in New York it requires only 149,496 to elect a member. It takes only 147,685 to elect a member from Pennsylvania; and only 146,565 to elect a member from Illinois. Under my amendment, when we accord to these States the number of members named they secure a larger number of Representatives than their population in mathematical exactness entitles them to. New York, with 33 Representatives, as my amendment proposes, has 154,026 people behind each Representative, a trifle in excess of the ratio. Pennsylvania, with 28, has a population of 152,960 to each Representative, less than the ratio. Illinois, with 20, has a population of 153,893 to each Representative.

Again, in Illinois, under the bill, it requires 146,565 persons to elect a member; that is all. Step over the line into Wisconsin, and it takes 164,437; a difference only of about 20,000 between the two States.

Another thing about the bill is peculiar. Iowa is entitled to 10.52 Representatives; the bill awards her 11. Wisconsin is entitled to 8.52 Representatives; the bill assigns her 8. Why not give her 9? She has the same fraction as Iowa. The new modulus determines that, I suppose. [Laughter.]

Why, sir, look at it. California with 5 Representatives under this bill, and a population of 864,694 has a Representative to every 172,938. Give to New York her 34 members and deny to California what she is justly entitled to, and the excess of representation in New York equals the entire representation of California. In other words, if you will assign to New York the same ratio of representation that you require in California, New York will be entitled to but 29 members. But by giving California only 5 members and New York 34 you give New York 5 members more than she is entitled to, if you should apply the same ratio to the two States; in other words, you give to New York an excess of representation that annihilates the whole representative power of California. Can you think of any thing more monstrous than that?

Now, a word more, and I am done. Wisconsin ought to vote for this amendment I have proposed because it does her justice. Florida ought to vote for it because it measures out justice to her. Rhode Island ought to support it because it is equitable to her. Illinois, Pennsylvania, and New York I am sure will approve of it, for though it diminishes their representation their sense of justice is too keen to allow them to resist a proposition so manifestly just. The balance of the States, taking them altogether, are not affected in the slightest degree by my amendment, and are left to that course which seems most in harmony with their sense of right and justice.

The following tables exhibit the States to which a Representative is accorded for a residuum of power greater than one-half, and those to which a Representative is denied for a residuum of power less than one-half:

I desire in conclusion to call the attention of the House briefly to what was said upon a bill similar to the one we are now considering by Mr. Everett. It is so pertinent to this whole question, both the bill and my amendment, that I venture upon your further indulgence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALDRICH in the chair.) The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HAZELTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I quote now from the speech of Edward Everett, in 1832:

Let it be recollected, too, that gross as the injustice is, it is magnified by the fact that it falls on those States, the smallest, which are least able to bear the loss of a member.

Is that anything like this bill?

It is urged that it is only a single member at the utmost which is lost; but this to a State like Delaware, entitled at best to but 2, is half her delegation. Let me bring in an amendment to the apportionment bill, which, leaving the total number of the House the same, shall deprive New York and Pennsylvania each of one-half of their delegations; let the question before this House be, not whether Delaware shall have 2 members or 1, but whether New York shall have 40 members or 20. I think we should then hear some appeals to our equity. I think we should then be told, give us our exact number, and, if you cannot give us our exact mathematical share, let us have that which comes nearest to it. Do not rob us of half our delegation, while you leave untouched the entire House.

But we are still told that this crying evil is the unavoidable result of dividing the population of the several States by a common ratio. If this were so, it would be merely proving, by the enormous injustice of the result, that such use of a common ratio is unconstitutional. But I deny the fact. I deny that any such results are obtained by a fair division of the population of the States by a common ratio. If there is anything on which a man may be permitted to speak with a little positiveness it is the simple rules of arithmetic. We learn them at school; I thought I did in my school-boy days become a tolerable proficient in short division; but since I have served seven years' apprenticeship in Congress, I find at least if the principles of this bill are sound that I know nothing about it. The bill in effect says that if you divide 610,408 by 47,000 you get 12. Now, I say you get no such thing. To make the matter clear and to show what sort of division the bill deals in let us take smaller numbers. Suppose you are to divide 9 by 5; what is the answer? The bill says 1.

That is what is said now in regard to Florida.

And this is the precise point I contest. Such a division will neither give one as the exact quotient nor as the answer nearest the exact quotient. Suppose an executor were called upon to divide an estate of $10,000 among five heirs, ignorant of the mystery of numbers, and he should proceed in his division thus: five into ten goes once; and, giving to each heir $1,000, put $5,000 into his own pocket. This would be downright knavery. But suppose the estate to be only $9,000, and he should then work his division as before, five into nine once, and put the $4,000 into his pocket. Would this be much more honest? Certainly not. Whether the dividend is nine or ten, the answer in neither case is one. But the bill says it is one. When I divide nine by five the answer, the exact answer, may be expressed two ways, which are of identical purport. It is either one, more four-fifths, or two, less one-fifth; or, in more mathematical language, it is either $1+\frac{4}{5}$, or $2-\frac{1}{5}$. These two expressions are precisely the same and each gives the result of the division. The former is the usual arithmetical expression, but in the higher mathematical notation one is just as common as the other. To say, then, that by dividing nine by five you get one, is an arithmetical falsehood. It is a wider departure from the truth than if you should say two and two make six. If, on a division of nine by five, an exact answer is required and is practicable, it is either $1+\frac{4}{5}$, or $2-\frac{1}{5}$. If the subject-matter does not admit exact division, if you must disregard fractions, then it is for common equity, or rather common sense, to decide whether you will neglect the large fraction or the small one; whether you will come as near the truth as you can, or not come as near as you can; whether you will take a number which, though not exact, is the nearest approach to exactness, or a number of which you can neither say that it is the true number or as near the true number as you can come. The amendment does the former; the bill does the latter. The principle of the bill is intolerable, even in matters of dollars and cents. The innate love of justice which animates us all would revolt at it, in a case where nothing more precious was at stake, than "So much trash as can be grasped thus." But when applied to the dearest political privileges, to the right of the people to be represented on this floor, and their share in making the laws under which their lives and liberties are held, it is truly shocking.

So spoke Edward Everett upon a proposition similar to the one before us; and here I leave the subject, only affirming that I believe my amendment, founded upon the principles I have sought to elucidate, satisfies the just demands of all the States and meets the requirements of the Constitution, which on this and on all occasions should be our constant and unquestioned guide.

Mr. TILLMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will yield, I will move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. TYLER. I would inquire of the Chair how much of my hour remains?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirteen minutes remaining.

Mr. TYLER. I desire to reserve that time to be used hereafter.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will yield the floor for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 2796) to appropriate $5,000 for packing, transporting, and arranging certain agricultural and mineral specimens.

J. H. VREELAND.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4214) for the relief of J. H. Vreeland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

OFFICIAL RECORDS OF THE WAR.

Mr. KLOTZ. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he hereby is, authorized to print from the stereotyped plates 1,000 copies each of volumes 1, 2, and 3 of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, said copies to be for sale by the Public Printer at cost and 10 per cent. added.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the right to object to that resolution, unless it can be referred to the Committee on Printing, which has the right to report at any time.

Mr. KLOTZ. This is probably the only resolution which has been offered in this House that will not cost the Government anything; not a cent. Volumes 1, 2, and 3 of the official records of the war have been exhausted. All the new members on this floor must buy those volumes to complete their sets. People are anxious to obtain these volumes; the country is demanding them. We get letters almost every day asking for them. I have been all over this town, and not a single copy of volumes 1, 2, and 3 of this work can be bought anywhere. This resolution proposes that the Public Printer shall print from the plates now on hand 1,000 copies of these volumes, and sell them at cost with 10 per cent. addition to those who may desire to buy them. That is all there is about it.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the resolution go to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering this resolution at this time?

Mr. HAZELTON. I object.

Mr. KLOTZ. Let it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAYNE: The resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, recommending the extension of the system of Government lights to the Monongahela River—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CAMPBELL: The petition of citizens of Meyersdale, Pennsylvania, for the adoption of measures for the suppression of polygamy—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CHAPMAN: Papers relating to the claim of Alfred Lyles, for compensation for labor performed under the Doorkeeper of the House in the Forty-fifth Congress—to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. DAWES: The petition of citizens of Owensborough, Kentucky, alleging a combination between the Standard Oil Company and certain railroad companies which does injustice to shippers of oil, and praying for an investigation—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. DIBRELL: The petition of the late supervisor of the census of the second district of Tennessee, for additional compensation—to the Committee on the Census.

By Mr. ERRETT: The resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, recommending that beacon-lights be established on the Monongahela River—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. FLOWER: The petition of Jennie M. Loszier, M. D., and others, for legislation for the suppression of polygamy—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GARRISON: The petition of citizens of Essex County, for dredging Piscataway Creek, in Virginia—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of William H. Vaughan, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army during the late rebellion—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HOBLITZELL: The petition of John C. McConnell, and accompanying bill, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KING: The petition of citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, for the repeal of tax on banks and stamps on bank-checks—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of citizens of Jackson Parish, Louisiana, for legislation regulating charges for railroad transportation—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McLANE: The petition of Mordecai & Co., of Baltimore, Maryland, for relief—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. MILES: Papers relating to the claim of Jacob Weideman, guardian of the minor child of Leopold Schmidt—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OURY: A bill for an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of the Colorado River of the West—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. PETTIBONE: The petition of James Hale, Hannah Dawson, and other heirs-at-law of Richard Hale, deceased, for a pension—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. RANDALL: Papers relating to the claim of Philip Lawall—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHALLENBERGER: The resolutions of the Pittsburgh (Pennsylvania) Chamber of Commerce, praying for the extension of beacon-lights to the Monongahela River—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. VANCE: Papers relating to the claim of Edward Haile—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. G. D. WISE: The petition of E. P. Pelkenton and others, tobacco manufacturers, praying that there be refunded to them the amount of the additional tax levied upon them under Commissioner Douglass's ruling on the act of March 3, 1875, which has since been declared illegal and void—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 10, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees of the House shall begin; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 2796) to appropriate $5,000 for packing, transporting, and arranging certain agricultural and mineral specimens; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting estimates of amounts (total $22,000) required to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for buildings and grounds in Washington City for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of Mrs. S. Jane Lincoln O'Brian and 88 others, citizens of Cornish, Maine, praying that the Federal Constitution may be so amended as to give equal political rights to all American citizens irrespective of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of C. V. McCafferty and others, citizens of Lamar and Pickens Counties, Alabama, praying for legislation regulating charges for railroad transportation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of the Minnesota State Temperance Union, officially signed, representing 15,000 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of citizens of Brunswick, Georgia, praying for an appropriation adequate to the improvement of the harbor and deepening of the channel at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have had transmitted to me by Mr. Winslow Judson, of Saint Joseph, Missouri, a petition of leading citizens of that place, asking the Senators and Representatives in Congress from that State to oppose the passage of any bill by the Congress of the United States which shall authorize any individuals, company, or corporation to erect a bridge across the Missouri River which shall not be of sufficient height to admit of the free passage thereunder of all such boats and crafts as are accustomed to ply thereon. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented additional evidence to accompany the bill (S. No. 1035) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union agency, Indian Territory, for services and expenses; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented papers to accompany the bill (S. No. 786) for the relief of David Waldo; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of citizens of Yorkville, South Carolina, praying for an appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Santee River, and especially for opening a connection between that river and Winyah Bay by way of Mosquito Creek; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of John Marshall and 190 others, citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for an amendment to the Constitution providing that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be abridged on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 283) for the relief of Charles E. Gunn, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 285) for the relief of Van B. Bowers, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 286) for the relief of Thomas Doak, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 738) for the relief of Jabez Burchard, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of Benjamin C. Bampton, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 578) to authorize the erection of a statue of Chief-Justice Marshall, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRISON (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1156) for the relief of Second Lieutenant James E. Macklin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1157) for the relief of Charles P. Wannall; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1158) to authorize the supreme court of the District of Columbia to appoint two additional criers; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, I suppose, as it is a matter of administration. I beg to inclose with it, with the permission of the Senate, a letter of Mr. Chief-Justice Cartter on the subject.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the bill has no connection whatever with the affairs of the District of Columbia. It appears to me that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the bill should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it will be so referred, with the accompanying paper.

Mr. CALL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1159) for the relief of M. Barios, of Key West, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1160) relating to the Idaho Land and Irrigation Company, and providing for the reclamation of arid lands in Idaho Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1161) relating to the Utah and Idaho Land and Irrigation Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PLUMB asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1162) to amend section 2343 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TELLER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1163) to give Mrs. Arravilla Meeker and Miss Josephine Meeker, wife and daughter of Indian Agent N. C. Meeker, deceased, each a quarter section of land upon payment of land-office fees; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MILLER, of California, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1164) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue Marine Service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1165) granting a pension to Joseph P. Andrew; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LAPHAM asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1166) to authorize the President to correct the commission of Captain John M. Hamilton, of the Fifth Cavalry, so as to date from July 28, 1866; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1167) to establish a mint of the United States at New York City; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 34) to provide for the publication of official report of the trial of the murderer of President Garfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Albert Hedberg be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, there being no adverse report.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Adolph Feinger be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of J. C. Hamner, administrator of G. M. Hamner, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT ON PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the Senate the report of the Treasury cattle commission on the lung plague of cattle or contagious pleuro-pneumonia.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees of the House shall begin was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUNISHMENT OF BIGAMY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to take this opportunity, before the proceedings go on, to say that the Committee on the Judiciary on next Tuesday will ask the Senate to take up and consider and dispose of, either on that day or the next, the bill (S. No. 353) to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes; and we shall hope, as the bill is short and the subject has attracted the attention of Senators for a long time, that on that day or the next we shall be able to have the bill disposed of finally in some way or other.

I give this notice because I understand the Senate has adopted the old habit of getting anything up when you can for the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After half past one?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot say after half past one. I rather think I shall ask it earlier, in order to be sure to dispose of the bill in those two days, inasmuch as some members of the committee will be obliged to be absent later in the week.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that I shall antagonize all measures, after the resolution in relation to the arrears of pensions act is disposed of, with the bill (S. No. 22) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal revenue laws.

D. T. KIRBY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar will be called under the Anthony resolution beginning at the point where its consideration was left off yesterday.

The bill (S. No. 175) for the relief of D. T. Kirby was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole yesterday, and reported to the Senate without amendment. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HERMAN BIGGS.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inform the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the bill (S. No. 173) for the relief of Herman Biggs was passed for the day yesterday, but the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] who seemed to have it in charge is not here. He requested that it be passed over for the day. The Chair will not have the bill called at this time, in the absence of the Senator from New Jersey, unless he has requested some Senator to take charge of it.

Mr. HALE. If the bill goes over now will it go over as it did yesterday, to come up to-morrow morning or the next day of the session?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. So that it will not lose its place?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will depend upon the pleasure of the Senate, but it is usual for that to be done where a bill is simply passed over. It can be called now and passed over for the day, and then it will come up again to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore Ordinarily bills that are passed over go to the foot of the Calendar, but where a bill is simply passed over for the day by the courtesy of the Senate, it is allowed to be considered the next day.

Mr. HALE. Let me make a suggestion in the absence of the Senator from New Jersey, who is unavoidably called away. I know he is anxious that the bill should pass, knowing fully about its merits. If any of the objections that were raised yesterday have been removed by further consideration and examination of the facts, I should be very glad to see the bill put upon its passage now. I know that that is the feeling of the Senator from New Jersey. It may be that the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] on examining into the case more fully, has found his objections removed. I see by looking at the report of the discussion in the last Congress that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] favored the bill at that time very warmly. I do not know but that he may withdraw his objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will direct the bill to be called, if it is insisted upon, but the Chair would not do so in the absence of the Senator from New Jersey, who requested that it might be laid over, unless the Senator from Maine says it shall be done now.

Mr. HALE. What I say now is on conference with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON;] but if there is further objection to the bill I do not ask it to be taken up at this time.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to say in regard to the bill that I am not conscious of any change of opinion upon it. My appeal at the last session was for the withdrawal of an objection to the consideration of the bill, and what I said was by way of inducement, in order that it might be done. I have not myself interposed any objection to its present consideration, for that is not my way of making opposition to a bill. When I object to a bill, I object on its merits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over, and the next bill on the Calendar will be called.

SAMSON GOLIAH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 423) for the relief of Samson Goliah, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It revokes the sentence of the general court-martial in the case of Samson Goliah, late a private in Company A, Fifty-fifth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, (colored,) finding him guilty of mutiny, and sentencing him to confinement at hard labor during the remainder of his term of service, to forfeit all pay and allowances due or to become due, and to be dishonorably discharged the service of the United States, promulgated in General Orders No. 136, of September 19, 1864, headquarters of the Department of the South, and also revokes the dishonorable discharge issued to him by virtue of the sentence revoked, and instructs the Secretary of War to issue and deliver to Samson Goliah an honorable discharge from the service of the United States, as of the date of the dishonorable discharge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report in that case read.

Mr. MAXEY. The report is a pretty long one, and I can save the Senator from Vermont some trouble by making a short statement of the facts as developed by the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont insist on the reading of the report?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at present. I am always glad to hear the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MAXEY. The package of papers in the case was a very large one, and I examined it with a great deal of care. The facts are in substance these: Samson Goliah was a colored man, and a member of a colored regiment. Formerly and recently, prior to his becoming a member of the Army, he had been a slave. On board a ship passing around the Atlantic coast a mutiny in his company occurred. He was tried as one of the originators of the mutiny, and sentenced by a court-martial during the remainder of his term of enlistment to hard labor and confinement with ball and chain, with a forfeiture of all pay and allowances, the court evidently being of the opinion that Goliah was the originator of the mutiny. As I stated, he was an ignorant man, and he had recently been a slave. He had no counsel; he did not know anything about how to examine witnesses; and that was the sentence. It subsequently became developed that he was not the originator of the mutiny, nor did he participate in it. That is certified to by quite a large number of the men of his company. The real perpetrator was discovered. These are the facts of the case.

This man, it seems, lives in Indianapolis, and the Senator from Indiana across the way [Mr. HARRISON] is familiar with the facts. Senator Morton took charge of the matter and the bill was originally introduced by him, and after his death Senator McDonald was very much interested in it, and I, at his instance, made a special investigation of it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Texas if this bill is anything more than an exercise of the pardoning power by Congress instead of by the President in regard to the sentence of a court-martial?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the trouble with it.

Mr. MAXEY. In reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say that it is not, in my judgment, an exercise of the pardoning power at all. I conceive that the Congress of the United States is invested with the same character of equity jurisdiction which is exercised so often by the Parliament of Great Britain, where justice is done according to the very right of the case and not within reach of the ordinary tribunals of the country. This I think is that case; neither more nor less.

As I was going on to state, I then examined this matter carefully. The bill was reported and it passed the Senate without a dissenting voice; and the report at the time was read. These are the facts. Of course I have no interest in the world in the case further than that it was given to me to report, and I am familiar with the facts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My call for the reading of the report did not arise from any doubt that I had as to the fidelity and intelligence of the committee in regard to the good deserts of this man; but the idea struck me which the Senator from Massachusetts has already stated, that it was open to very serious doubt, to say the least, how far a legislative body under the Constitution of the United States can undertake to do that thing which this bill proposes, no matter how clear the fact is to show us that in some way it ought to be done. That is the matter that troubled me, and I asked for the reading of the report in order to see whether the committee had in the report discussed that question.

Mr. MAXEY. My reply to the Senator from Massachusetts on that point was to my mind at least satisfactory, although perhaps to nobody else; but the position I take was sustained by the Senate by a vote of 55 to 1, although I may be very wrong in that position. In a case where the sentence of a court-martial had been pronounced against a distinguished officer and he had been dismissed from the service, upon a fair and clear representation of the case, the Senate of the United States set aside that sentence of the court-martial and declared it null and void. The relief proposed for this poor negro man is simply placing him upon the same plane of common honesty and common justice. As I said, I have no interest in the case more than any other member of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know the Senator from Texas never has any interest in a case except that which the public good induces him to have. I do not know to what case he refers.

Mr. MAXEY. I refer to the case of Dr. Hammond.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was not present in the Senate at the time that was acted on; so I do not know; but we have lived long enough in this world, unhappily, to know that even this body not very infrequently is led from its sentiments of equity to step considerably outside of the boundary of its powers.

What is the sentence of a court-martial? The Constitution of the United States provides by clear implication, if not by express terms, for that species of tribunal in the land and naval forces of the United States. As to those, which seems to be this case, the military jurisdiction stands, so far as I can understand it, exactly as the civil jurisdiction in other criminal cases stands between persons who are not members of the military or naval forces of the United States and the Government. I will wait a minute, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will come to order, and conversation will cease.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to tax the patience of the Senate upon a mere question of our constitutional powers. The people who made the Constitution ought to have known enough of the future and what would compose this body to have provided in it that the Senate should be a law unto itself, and that whatever we thought it right to do it should be constitutional to do; but as the fathers lacked wisdom in that respect, we seem to be rather bound probably to follow the Constitution as it is until it is changed.

Suppose there had been an indictment against this man in a judicial court of the United States, and he had been sentenced to the penitentiary or to the jail, and a bill were introduced to revoke that sentence, to set it aside, and restore him to the rights and benefits of which he had been deprived by that sentence, can it be possible that any Senator who hears me would hesitate to say that it was not within the competency of this legislative body to do that thing?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question there? I perceive, for one, the importance of the question. I ask the Senator if he conceives that the exercise of the power of trial and condemnation by a military tribunal like the one that sentenced this man is the exercise of any judicial power under the laws and Constitution of the United States? The Senator will pardon me for saying that the trouble would be to my mind in the other case, because when the court sentences a man to die, or to go to the penitentiary on indictment, it is the exercise of purely judicial power, with which we as a legislative body have no authority to interfere.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That, of course, I was sure every Senator would agree to. Then we come to the comparison of these two exertions of the power of the Government over crimes. This man being in the military or naval forces of the United States committed the offense, because the bill treats it as if he had committed it. The fact that he did not is the only motive that leads us to set aside the sentence. Let us take a man who did commit the offense, therefore. He has committed a crime against the United States. By what law is he to be punished? A crime of this character being a military crime could not be punished in the civil courts of the United States. It must be tried, according to the Constitution and laws of Congress, by a court-martial. What is the nature of a court-martial in regard to the subjects over which the Constitution and the laws have extended this species of military court? I think the Supreme Court of the United States has decided, I think all other civil judicial courts have decided, that the sentence of a military court in a case within its jurisdiction,—as it appears this one was; at least I will assume it, and no suggestion is made in the report that there is any irregularity, it was only a mistake of evidence—that the sentence of a military court in regard to a subject that is within its jurisdiction is a judicial sentence, that it has all the effect of a judicial sentence, and every quality of a judicial sentence; and that the civil courts of the United States have no power to review it, or to set it aside, or to dispose of it in any manner.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure. I am only struggling to get information.

Mr. HARRISON. So I perceive. I understand the objection interposed to this bill to be that it is the exercise by the legislative branch of the Government of the pardoning power; at least that is one form of the objection. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont, whether in this case there is any power in the President to right the wrong which the committee believe has been done to this man? The sentence has been executed. It consisted in part of imprisonment, which he suffered; it consisted in part of the forfeiture of his pay and allowances. Has the President any power to remit that; and is it not fully within the power of Congress, at least so far as that penalty consisted of the forfeiture to the United States of the pay and allowances of this man, to restore these to him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am very glad that my friend from Indiana has asked that question, and I am very glad that I feel able to answer it immediately, to my own satisfaction at least; whether to that of anybody else or not, I do not know.

I do say this without hesitation, that in my opinion it is within the competence of the President of the United States to remit, pardon, absolve this man from all the effects of that crime, because on the record it stands as a crime, though it turns out that there was a mistake as to the evidence. Having done that, or without having done it, I will say it is within the competence of the Congress of the United States to give to this man, by calling it restoration or otherwise as an indemnity for injustice, just so much money as the legislative power chooses to pay. There is no doubt of that. We can offer, if we wish, a premium on desertion, I agree, and we can pay out of the Treasury money to people who desert and give them a bounty for it if we want to do so.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will allow me, then, as this unfortunate man is at present a constituent of mine, I think I will ask the consent of the Senate that the bill be recommitted to the Military Committee. It was not framed by me or under my inspection at all. I found that it had been favorably reported from the Military Committee at a previous session of Congress. I think we can in committee obviate the objections that are made, and secure to this man all that he really ought to have by a frame of bill that will avoid the objections of the Senator from Vermont. Therefore I think I shall end the discussion by moving to recommit the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dare say that can be done; but I am sure that the Executive Department of the Government would, upon these facts being represented to him, exert his part of doing justice to correct this mistake immediately and with pleasure. I think the legal effect of that would be to restore all that this man has forfeited by this sentence, his right to pay, &c., at once by a mere act of the Executive. Then that being done the difficulty that would arise would be that very likely the appropriation out of which, in the time of it, he would have been entitled to be paid these sums of money, has lapsed and is gone; and consequently it may still require an act of Congress (which can just as well be passed now if Congress is satisfied it is right) to provide this pay. Of course, we all understand that often sentences of courts-martial mistaken are reversed by a pardon, and charges of desertion entered in the Army records are removed by the Executive Department under the authority of law, which at once restores the soldier to his original right. He then becomes entitled, by mere force of that, to the pay that he had not drawn, to his bounty, to his pension, and everything that he had lost. But very likely there would be a difficulty, that being done, about there being any money in the Treasury available for precisely that purpose.

But as the question itself is of so much importance and the danger, after discussion and a fair understanding of it, of taking a step that in its wider application we should regret on this constitutional question of our powers is so great, I shall be very glad indeed if the bill can be recommitted to the committee with a view to so frame it as to make it merely a restitution to this man in money, and I am sure the Executive would do his part as to the rest of it, the clearing of his honor to satisfy what appears from the statement of the Senator from Texas to be right about it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I readily acknowledge the importance of the principle which has been brought to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Vermont. It goes very far beyond the consequences of this bill. The proposition, as I understand, laid down by him is that the Congress of the United States has no authority to grant relief from a sentence of a court-martial trying a person within the confines of the Army and Navy of the United States; that such a tribunal exercises a power and an authority equal in dignity and attended with the same consequences as those following the judgment of a regularly constituted judicial tribunal.

I very well comprehend the force of precedent in this body; and without knowing anything about the facts of this particular case, I shall never subscribe to the principle laid down by the distinguished Senator from Vermont. That principle was fully debated in what is known as the Porter case some time ago, when this extraordinary doctrine was contended for with a force of reasoning and an eloquence that was seldom brought to the support of any sophistry I have ever heard of.

Now, sir, in my judgment, under the Constitution Congress has full, complete, and plenary power over the Army, over all judgments rendered by military tribunals, and can set them aside at its pleasure and turn the culprits free. I do not, when I say this, mean that we could interfere with the judgment of a regularly constituted judicial tribunal sitting under the authority of the Constitution or the laws of the United States. I will not say that a criminal indicted in this District or in any of the circuits of the Union for an offense against the laws of the United States could be turned loose by an act of Congress, because such a criminal is subject to the regular judicial authority of the Union, a co-ordinate branch of the Government with which we have no authority to interfere. But, sir, I hold that a military tribunal organized under the articles of war is in no sense a judicial tribunal; that its judgments——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator claim that the pardoning power of the President does not extend to sentences of courts-martial?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is not the question before the Senate. I have been arguing for the power of Congress over the subject. The Senator may call that a pardoning power if he pleases, but I do not conceive that this question requires me at this time to go into the discussion of the right of the President to extend the pardoning power to cases of this kind, for the distinct question before the Senate involves only the right of Congress to deal with this, and I do not intend to be led away from the main question by an inquiry of that kind.

Now, Mr. President, I affirm here, as I have affirmed before, that the authority of Congress over the Army is full and complete, and that the judgment of a court-martial is not a judicial judgment, that that judgment rendered by a detail of officers in conformity with the Articles of War can at any time be set aside by Congress outside of the pardoning power, independent of the President, and that a two-thirds vote in this and the other House can destroy the effect of any judgment rendered by a board constituted under the Articles of War and may turn the man free.

The Senator from Vermont says that all cases falling within the jurisdiction of a military tribunal cannot be reversed by the Supreme Court. Very likely; I think they have so decided. But that is not the question. The Supreme Court has no authority to go outside of its jurisdiction to take judicial cognizance of a case falling within the jurisdiction of a court-martial; but I say that the authority of Congress under the Constitution extends over courts-martial and all judgments rendered by them, because the Constitution so extends it. The Constitution does not give to the Supreme Court any such superintending authority. What does the Constitution say?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senate that after the Senator from Florida concludes the Chair will enforce the five minutes' rule.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Very well, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair indulges him because the Chair did not apply the rule to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Constitution says:

> The Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years;
> The Congress shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

That is the power conferred on Congress by the Constitution, and they have exercised it when they provided the articles of war.

Where is the limitation upon our power over the Army? Are not the members of a board of offices when they sit as a military tribunal to try a person who may have infringed the rules of the service and to that extent impaired the discipline of the public force, just as much a part of the Army when they are sitting on a military board as they are when they are off it? And it is to Congress and to Congress alone that the Constitution has confided the superintending authority over the Army.

When it comes to the judicial power vested by the Constitution of the United States in the regularly constituted tribunals of the Union, that is a distinct question. The authority that is exercised in the District of Columbia over criminals by indictment or in the several judicial districts throughout the Union is the exercise of the judicial power, and that power the Constitution has expressly commanded shall be delegated to courts to be created for that purpose, and such courts shall be presided over by officers who shall hold their office during the term of good behavior, and who shall receive stated compensation for their services, not to be diminished during the period of their offices. That is the lodgement of the judicial power. But will any one say that a board of officers brought into life under the Articles of War, created by Congress in virtue of the power in the Constitution which gives to Congress the absolute regulation of the public force, is a tribunal whose judgments are so sacred, and binding, and solemn, that the creator of the Army, the guardian of its discipline, the preserver of its integrity, cannot look into it? What kind of reasoning is that to say that while the Constitution has given to the representatives of the States and the people full control, unlimited power over the Army to prescribe every rule necessary to its conservation and discipline, yet when it comes to the rendition of a judgment by a board of officers, which it has authorized to be created to preserve its discipline, this great body has no right to look into its judgments and set them aside if it thinks proper?

The Senator from Vermont said that this was a case falling within the jurisdiction of the military tribunal that tried the man. I do not question it. So would a case be within its jurisdiction if half the Union was under martial law, and we have known that exigencies have arisen in this country when large districts of the Union from necessity were put under martial law, and every person in those districts was amenable only to military law, was liable to be tried by military tribunals before boards of officers created for that purpose; and if a case of that kind were here now, would it be said that the case was one within military jurisdiction and that Congress would have no power to interfere with it?

Will any Senator on this floor undertake to say, if a large part of this Union was under martial law and the military in command within it, with authority to try citizen and soldier, the right of trial by jury destroyed, the habeas corpus suspended, the rights of the citizen gone, that a military tribunal created to give full force and effect to military law under such circumstances as those would have the power to act independently of Congress, and that the representatives of the States and the people assembled in this Capitol would have no authority to look into, or revise, set aside, and destroy any of their judgments? Is that to be the doctrine of the Senate and of the other House? Will the people of this great country ever surrender this great safeguard for the protection of their liberties which resides in this and in the other House to guard against the extension of military authority?

Sir, in my judgment there can be no question with respect to the right and the duty of Congress to set aside any and every judgment rendered by a military commission or court-martial when it may appear to have been founded in injustice and error.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana sees proper to ask to have this bill recommitted, as a matter of course I shall not object.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will allow me, I will withdraw my application to recommit, and simply ask that the bill may go over, retaining its place on the Calendar, until to-morrow, when I will propose an amendment that will probably obviate the objection.

Mr. MAXEY. I prefer to say what I have to say about it now.

Mr. President, I examined this bill with great care from the beginning to the end. It may be that I am not capable after that examination of coming to a legal conclusion with the accuracy of the Senator from Vermont; but I undertake to state that the doctrine which he has laid down this morning would be, in my judgment, subversive of the very fundamental principles of liberty; a doctrine which would invest a mere ephemeral court, having no existence save as it is called into being for a specific purpose and which passes out of existence when that purpose is accomplished, with such august power that even the Congress of the United States cannot have the poor privilege of setting aside an unjust sentence of that court. I deny the principle. I say that Congress, in my judgment, has absolute and complete control of this question.

More than that, the Senator from Vermont asks the Senate to go back in terms upon its action at a former session when the Senate, without a dissenting voice, passed this very bill, in the identical language in which it is presented to the Senate now. It may be that they are growing wiser, that the Senator is enlightening everybody and teaching the whole Senate new principles of law and new doctrines.

The very judgment of a court-martial, when it is a question of death or dismissal, amounts to nothing at all until it is approved by the final reviewing officer. It is not the solemn judgment of a court which is conclusive and binding, but it is a conditional judgment, conditioned upon its being affirmed and approved by the reviewing power. In no sense has it any of the attributes known to the law as attendant upon a court of competent jurisdiction in the proper sense of the word "court;" and if Congress has not jurisdiction of this case it had not jurisdiction of the Hammond case, it had not jurisdiction of the Armes case, it had not jurisdiction of twenty cases at least which have passed through since I have been here without any mortal man raising a question of jurisdiction. The question was never raised in the committee on either occasion; it was never raised in the Senate before in any one of these cases, so far as I know. Now, I have only to say to the Senator from Indiana that it is his case, not mine; it is his constituent, not mine; I have done my whole duty, and I wash my hands of it. The Senator from Indiana can take charge of the case, and do with it as he thinks best.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that the question which has been discussed is one of the most doubtful questions arising under our Constitution. The pardoning power, which is the power to remit all the penal consequences of a judgment of a court, is vested by the Constitution in the President of the United States, and vested exclusively.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me a moment, so far as the pardoning power is concerned I do not think it has anything to do with the case. The man has already served out all the punitory part of the sentence.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator is not addressing himself to any point I was proposing to make. I was merely making this statement in advance.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator spoke of the pardoning power.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it is clear that that pardoning power attaches to the judgments of tribunals created by Congress as much as to the judgments of tribunals created by the Constitution itself. Nobody doubts that. Nobody doubts that the President has a right to pardon a person convicted by a court in the Territories, although that court is entirely created by Congress and its judges do not hold office during good behavior, or to pardon a prisoner condemned to imprisonment by the courts of the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me?

Mr. HOAR. I have but five minutes, and I do not wish to transgress the rule myself.

Now, Mr. President, Congress has undertaken, in the exercise of its plenary power over the Army and Navy, to provide so far as may be, tribunals in the similitude of courts, and to preserve so far as is possible judicial proceedings, and under them persons are sentenced to forfeiture of property, to long terms of imprisonment, to death, and to disgrace, which, in the eye of the soldier and the sailor, is worse than death.

Now, it seems to me that whether it be true that the remission of such sentences is strictly and constitutionally an exercise of the pardoning power, or whether it be within the general jurisdiction of Congress over the Army and Navy, so that we can set aside or revoke any judgment which has been passed by such a tribunal, it is in the highest degree inexpedient for Congress to enter upon that jurisdiction, except in cases of clear necessity. Nobody, I suppose, on the other side questions that the President may pardon a person condemned by a military or naval court-martial.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think it is open to great question.

Mr. HOAR. I have never heard it questioned before.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I question it here.

Mr. HOAR. I do not believe on consideration the honorable Senator from Florida will doubt it. At any rate it has been exercised time and again by the President without question. It was impossible for Mr. Lincoln to refrain from the constant exercise of that pardoning power. Now, the point I wish to make is that whatever may be the judgment of any Senator in regard to the constitutional power of Congress to pass bills like this, we should, unless justice and humanity imperatively require the assertion of this jurisdiction, having created judicial tribunals as near as we could under the circumstances, leave the matter to pursue the practices of judicial tribunals, and let the Executive deal with the sentences and judgments of judicial tribunals in criminal cases in the Army and Navy; and it is highly inexpedient, whether the constitutional power exists here or not, for Congress to enter upon its exercise.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has spoken once.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I merely want to reply to something that was said by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not in order.

Mr. HARRISON. I simply rise to ask consent of the Senate that the bill remain on the Calendar until to-morrow, and I shall then propose an amendment to obviate the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate consent that this bill be passed over informally until the next session of the Senate? If there be no objection, it is passed over informally.

ULYSSES S. GRANT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 59) to place Ulysses S. Grant, late General and ex-President of the United States, upon the retired list of the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed, as the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] who reported it, is too unwell to be present to-day.

BUILDING FOR PENSION BUREAU.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 484) to amend a certain clause in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1881.

Mr. ALLISON. Since this bill was under consideration some days ago changes have taken place with reference to the Quartermaster-General's Office, and when the committee reported the bill they had especially in view the services of General Meigs. I do not feel like pressing this bill now in view of the probability that other amendments may be needed. Therefore I ask that it may be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 314) to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway-mail service; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAXEY. That bill was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads by myself. It has already been discussed at a former Congress in the Senate, and after full discussion passed the Senate without a dissenting voice, in the exact form that the bill is now. There is an elaborate report accompanying it. I will state that it is recommended by the Postmaster-General and the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, and does not cost the Government of the United States one solitary additional cent.

There is a verbal amendment needed in line 17. The word "allowed" should be "allow."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. DAVIS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 164) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying a pension to Mary A. Davis, stepmother of Benjamin F. Rodgers, late a private in Company H, Bissell's Engineers, West Missouri Volunteers. The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions, with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 6, to strike out the word "stepmother" and to insert "foster-mother."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the end of the bill the following:

And pay her a pension at the rate of $8 a month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MIAMI INDIAN LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 328) to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, having been sent down by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with a request filed by the Indians themselves for the sale of this little remnant of their reservation, containing about ten thousand acres. It is necessary that there should be certain amendments in order to make it conform with existing laws and carry out the purpose of the bill.

In line 8 of section 1 the word "heir" should be changed to "heirs," so as to read "heirs-at-law of such," there being some cases where there is more than one heir.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. In line 11 of the same section, the words "for cash" should be stricken out, because they conflict with a provision existing in the latter part of the section declaring that these lands may be sold on installments, and I propose to insert the words "for cash" after the word "in" in line 20, so that it shall provide that payment may be made thereafter in cash or installments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that amendment and that clause of the bill. This selling on credit is not so very safe.

Mr. INGALLS. This does not change it at all, it merely transfers these words. If the Senator from Vermont will give me his attention for a moment I will state to him that this amendment does not propose to change the terms of sale at all, but as it now stands in line 11 the provision is that the settlers may buy for cash, whereas in the latter portion of the same section it is provided that the payment may be made in three installments. I propose to strike out the words "for cash," in line 11, and insert them after the word "in" and before "three," in line 20, so as to read, "shall be permitted to make payment therefor in cash or in three equal annual installments."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the amendment striking out the words "for cash" in line 11? The Chair hears no objection, and that amendment is made. Now it is proposed to insert the words "cash or in" before the word "three" in line 20.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now in line 1 of section 2 I move to strike out the word "entered" and insert "purchased," because this is not an entry under the land laws, but a purchase at sale by the Interior Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now in line 2 of section 2 I move to strike out the words "one year" and insert "six months," so as to provide that these payments shall be made in six months instead of one year.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the object of that?

Mr. INGALLS. In order to shorten the time of payment, that the Indians may sooner get their money, and the land be sooner subject to taxation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Now in line 10 of the same section I move to strike out the word "entered," which is there by mistake, and insert the words "purchased by said settlers," the word "entered" being the wrong word; the land being disposed of not by entry but by sale.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to have the Senator from Kansas tell us how under the act of March 3, 1873, this question arises? How can there be a bona fide settler occupying a portion of the unallotted Miami Indian lands in Kansas in view of the act of 1873?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not understand the relevancy of the question. The act of 1873 has expired by limitation. That act provided that these lands should be sold within a specified period, and they have not been sold. Those persons who went on the land went there with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Indians. There was some dispute between the parties as to the appraisement, the allegation being made that it was too high; and in order to give the parties the opportunity of testing that question the Department of the Interior allowed the period of sale to go over, so that now no person under the law of 1873 can perfect title by purchase or otherwise; and this is to cure the difficulty that exists in consequence of the title not having been perfected under the law of 1873.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see that the act of 1873——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past one has arrived and this bill must go over until the next meeting of the Senate.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to give notice that on Monday, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I will call up for reference Senate bill No. 939, heretofore introduced by me, being a bill providing for entrance into and promotion in the civil service of the Government by competitive examination, for the purpose of asking the indulgence of the Senate to submit some remarks.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1024) for the relief of Sidney P. Luther; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1670) for the relief of E. J. Gurley.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas on the 12th of January in reference to the arrears of pensions act, on which the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] has the floor.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, yesterday evening when I took the floor it was with the purpose of making some few remarks upon the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] confining my remarks entirely to that amendment.

Mr. FRYE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine rise to address the Chair?

Mr. FRYE. I gave notice yesterday that I would call up the tariff commission bill immediately after the morning hour to-day. I do not know what the Senator from Texas desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate as the unfinished business. The Senate can set aside the unfinished business with a view to have the Senator from Maine submit his remarks if it wishes. The Senator from Texas is on the floor, as he had the floor when the resolution went over yesterday. Will the Senate postpone temporarily the unfinished business with a view to the Senator from Maine calling up the bill indicated by him, upon which he wishes to address the Senate?

Mr. FRYE. I will not ask it.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me to suggest that the Senator from Texas finish the remarks he commenced, and then allow the Senator from Maine to come in.

Mr. FRYE. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. MAXEY. I stated on yesterday that my purpose was to speak to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and to reply to the remarks made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] on that amendment.

The resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is:

That, in the opinion of the Senate, the act of January 25, 1879, commonly known as the arrears of pensions act, ought not to be repealed.

To that the Senator from South Carolina adds:

And that Congress ought to enact a law granting a pension to the needy and disabled soldiers of the Mexican war.

The question then, and the only question so far as that amendment is concerned, is, Is it true that there are men who served in that war who are needy? Ought Congress to pass laws providing pensions for the needy and disabled soldiers of the Mexican war? That is the question. It is not a question whether there may be men in the Senate or in the House of Representatives who served in that war who may be rich. That is not the question; but the question is whether the needy and disabled of that war, so far as this amendment is concerned, shall be properly provided for by the Government. As a question, then, of right, a question of equity, a question of justice, let us look into it and see whether the proposition as laid down ought to be carried into effect, and such laws ought to be made as contemplated by the amendment.

Mr. President, as a question of historical fact the Mexican war is the only war that has ever been fought by the American people where the material results were of benefit to this country. It is the only war that was ever fought where the American people, the volunteer soldiery and the regular Army, were required to leave their home and country and pass into a foreign land and there uphold the flag of the Union. This war, therefore, is exceptional. It is the only war that was ever fought by the American people which added territory and wealth illimitable to the Union. When that war closed, as one of the results of it there was added to this Union the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, Nevada, Utah, the larger portion of Colorado, a portion of Wyoming Territory, and the whole of the great State of California. It was an empire in area and an empire in wealth added by that war to the Union.

Who, I ask, were the instruments of this Government in the procurement of that vast acquisition to the wealth of our country? The instruments were the men who shouldered their muskets and left their own homes and country and fought under the flag of the Union upon a foreign soil. They were the instruments of the Government. Now the question is, ought they to be pensioned? Not the rich ask the pension, but the poor, the needy, the disabled. Ought these men who have added this grand empire to be provided for by the Government? I said on a former occasion that there had been dug from the bowels of the earth in the country added by that war an amount of gold and silver ample to pay the entire public debt, dug out of that territory which was added to the Federal Union and was the legitimate result of the Mexican war, and which results were brought about in part by the very men proposed to be benefited by this measure.

I was furnished yesterday evening with a statement by the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR,] showing the mining products of the Pacific States and Territories, comprising gold, silver, and bullion by years from 1852 to 1880, by which it appears that there was dug out of the mines of California, Utah, Nevada, and Arizona, all of which came under the jurisdiction of the United States as the result of the Mexican war, $1,617,174,916; and in addition to that, between 1848 and 1852, when no accurate records were kept, there were dug from those mines, according to the best estimates, $147,000,000, making the entire amount reported $1,764,174,916 of gold and silver. This table contains only the amount carried by express, and does not include that carried by mail or by private parties, so that the statement which I made, that out of the mines in the territory acquired by the Mexican war there had been dug enough of the precious metals to pay the entire national debt, is entirely true. The detailed statement is:

In addition to that, Mr. President, you have only to look to the Pacific coast and you will find there the city of San Francisco, which to-day is the third city in the amount of customs dues collected. You have but to look to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads, which connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans together across that territory, and thus you have a direct route from New York to San Francisco, and thence by the Sandwich Islands on to China and the East Indies, the great trade which the commercial world for more than 2,000 years had been seeking to capture. That overland route was an impossibility save and except by and through the acquisition of that territory brought into this Union by the exertions of our soldiers of the Mexican war. And still later since that was done you have another great route. The Texas and Pacific running 800 miles through that magnificent State in which I live, connecting the Atlantic and Pacific by the Southern line free from snows, passing through Texas by El Paso and thence on to San Francisco, thus connecting by a direct line of railway communication the city of San Francisco with the great cities of the South, Galveston, New Orleans, Savannah and so on.

These results were impossible save and except through this war. Then, as I once before said and as I now here repeat, it is a recognized principle that those in the Navy who make captures on the high seas are entitled to their prize-money out of the property thus captured; and here where this grand empire in wealth and in area was added to our country by the prowess of these men who left their country and went into Mexico following the flag of the Union, the Stars and Stripes at the command of their Government, I ask in equity, in good conscience, is it not right that these men should receive at least some assistance from this Government in their declining years? I have no respect for any man's sense of justice or fair dealing who would refuse it.

Mr. President, I have seen the criticisms in a few newspapers; but when you come to the great toiling masses, about whom so much has been said; when you come to the American people, honest men, true men, men of courage, men who believe that a man who has upheld the flag of his country when called upon by his Government to do so, these, with one accord, say he should not, when needy and disabled, drag out his lingering days in poverty and distress, but that his Government should come to his aid. The tax-payers, the people, say it. Is that true? Let us see.

There are on file to-day, I venture to say, in the Committee on Pensions, absolute, positive instructions from much more than a majority of the States of this Union instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to vote a pension to the soldiers of the Mexican war. In old times Democrats used to believe in the doctrine of the right of instruction, and some of us believe so yet. The State of Kentucky has had read here in the Senate and spread upon the records and filed here solemn instructions from her Legislature, instructing her Senators and requesting her Representatives to vote for a measure pensioning the soldiers of the Mexican war. The State which I in part represent has given like instructions, and I venture to assert that my colleague and myself will both abide by those instructions, and not a mortal man in that State, the heaviest tax-payer in it, but will say that we have done right in so doing.

Why, Mr. President, I do not know now how it is in Kentucky. I am a native of that State, and the time was when I did know something about how the people there felt. I remember well that when the soldiers of that gallant State went out to Mexico in obedience to the call of their country the people all over that State—men and women, old and young, black and white—came out and bade them God speed. I remember well that when they returned, all over that State they were received with every demonstration of approbation and joy; barbecues were given all over the country; men and women vied with each other in showing their respect for those men who had bared their breasts to the leaden storm, and who had come out of that war, as many of them did, covered with glory, and adding renown to the grand old State which gave them birth.

I remember also that the Legislature of that State then—not a Democratic Legislature, but a Whig Legislature, still honoring Henry Clay, the gallant and daring Henry of Navarre, to follow whose white plume was considered an honor by every man of his party, and I was one of those. I remember the Whig Legislature, in the State of Kentucky, passed a bill making an appropriation to send to Mexico and bring back from that country the bones of her gallant dead; and they were brought back, and were buried at the expense of the State in the State cemetery. I remember that all Kentucky when that was done was assembled, either personally or by representatives, and the grandest requiem that was ever sung by mortal man to the dead was recited by its author, Theodore O'Hara, on that occasion, himself a soldier of the Mexican war. It was of them that he sang:

On fame's eternal camping-ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

So expressive were these lines deemed that our Union friends have inscribed them on every national cemetery in this country. The State of Kentucky erected a beautiful marble monument, and under the shadow of its white shaft lie to-day the bones of McKee, of Clay, of Vaughan, of Philip Norbourne Barbour, and of other gallant and true men of that gallant old State, placed there by the proud State of which they were sons. Tell me, Mr. President, that all over that land the people of Kentucky will not indorse to the very echo the sentiment of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina?

What Kentuckian would begrudge the pittance he would have to pay toward the support of these needy, gallant, disabled soldiers?

Why, Mr. President, Texas, always and everywhere gallant, brave, generous, manly, and true, has at her own expense made liberal contributions in land and money to the noble band of surviving heroes of Texan independence. Honored be the State which thus cares for her defenders.

Mr. President, go back, if you please, to the days of Buena Vista, and look at the gallant charge made there by McKee, of the Second Kentucky, under a shower of shot to march under, which was like the charge of the brave six hundred at Balaklava. McKee fell; did his regiment falter? A nobler man God never put breath into than William R. McKee. I knew him well. Next came Henry Clay, the gallant son of the most gallant and fearless man, in my judgment, that this country ever produced. He fell next. Then came William T. Willis, and Vaughan; and hundreds of other men were shot down, but the few that remained bore on under orders, and ultimately victory perched upon the banner of the American Union. I need not recount the illustrious deeds of others of other States. Victory was grasped out of the very jaws of defeat, and a splendid victory was won.

Scott's campaign from the landing at Vera Cruz to the capture of the city of Mexico stands without a parallel for genius, dash, daring, and unfaltering devotion to the flag, in all the annals of history, ancient or modern.

Tell me that that State of Kentucky will say that the disabled and needy of her own sons shall not be helped? I do not believe it. I have not lived in that State for a quarter of a century, but I am a "native and to the manner born," and I think I have enough of the old blood left in me to know how Kentucky feels. Kentuckians feel with the Senator from South Carolina. I say the Senator from South Carolina was right. I remember well when the Palmetto regiment covered itself with glory at the battle of Churubusco in the attack upon the hacienda. There never was a regiment on the green earth which did better or more gallant work than was done by the Palmetto regiment in that action. It came out of that fight on the evening of the 20th of August, 1847, torn almost into shreds; but there are a few of them yet remaining survivors, and of those few many need the aid of the Government, and it does honor to the head and the heart of the Senator from South Carolina that he should have brought forward this proposition. I have specially mentioned Kentucky for the reason that I thought the Senator from that State, in his remarks yesterday evening, was inclined to underestimate the claims of those men, and I have specially mentioned South Carolina for the reason that one of her Senators offered the amendment to which I speak.

Mr. President, this is no new proposition. I have always been a believer in it, and when the Shields amendment for pensioning our soldiers of the Mexican war came up here on that night which we all so well remember, I voted for the Shields amendment, sent my vote out to my own people and to the world for pensioning all the survivors. As far as I was concerned I believed it then; I believe it to-day. How, I ask, can any man who voted for the Shields amendment, which was a sweeping amendment, taking in all of them, taking in, if you please, those mythical persons whom I heard described yesterday with their hundreds of thousands of dollars in the Senate and in the House, vote against this? How could a man who voted for that amendment, taking all in, now decline to vote for the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, which limits this aid to the few who are needy and disabled? Or if the present amendment covered all, as I would prefer, how could a man who voted for the Shields amendment vote against one now as broad as that amendment which took in all the survivors? I cannot understand it.

Mr. President, it is true you may say that this amendment is but an expression of opinion by the Senate that this ought to be done. Sir, it is an expression of opinion, it is true, but it is the key-note, it will ring out to the poor soldier all through this land as the pibroch of the Campbells did at Lucknow to their starving countrymen. Let the note be sounded here that the Senate of the United States has the boldness to stand to the front and say these men ought to be pensioned, and as sure as the sun rises and sets in due time will come the legislation which this amendment says ought to be enacted, and with it the "well done" of all the people.

Mr. BECK. I will not detain the Senate long. Before any controversy can be had upon any subject, the facts ought to be agreed. Any man can make a good speech if you allow him to make his own facts. If I am mistaken in the facts I am now about to state, then I am mistaken about everything. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina reads thus:

> And that Congress ought to enact a law granting a pension to the soldiers of the Mexican war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Kentucky that that was amended by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] adding the words "needy or disabled," which was accepted by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAXEY. As printed on the paper which I read in the course of my remarks.

Mr. BECK. That is a mistake. I have read the paper that was laid upon our desks yesterday morning, containing the Senator from South Carolina's amendment, leaving out the words "needy or disabled;" and at the close of the proceedings the day before yesterday, the Senator from South Carolina, among other things, said:

> There may be a great deal of force in what the Senator from Massachusetts says. I am not prepared at this time to say whether his statement is entirely correct as to what has been the law of this country on that subject. My understanding has always been, however, that all the soldiers of previous wars have been pensioned without special regard to their circumstances. If that is not so——
> Mr. HOAR. It is not so, I assure the Senator.
> Mr. BUTLER. Then perhaps there might be great force in what the Senator says, and I am not sure but that I would concede that he is entirely correct. However, as I said awhile ago, I should like very much to have this matter go over until to-morrow. I think it very likely that we may get to some common ground on which we may agree. As to any acrimonious debate being gotten up on this subject, I do not apprehend that. Everybody here seems to be in a very good humor now.

After some further discussion the Senator from South Carolina said further:

> I have not the slightest feeling about the matter. I shall vote for the resolution of the Senator from Kansas. I voted for the bill to which it refers, and shall vote again to sustain it. I do not see why there should be any feeling about it; it is purely a matter of business and justice. Feeling that way, I thought perhaps we might agree with our friends on the other side to pension the Mexican soldiers so that both might go together. I again ask the Senator from Kansas to allow this resolution to go over till to-morrow. I know of one or two gentlemen who desire to submit some remarks. I think he will save time by this course.

To which the Senator from Kansas assented. The Senator from South Carolina up to that time had not accepted any modification about the needy and disabled soldiers. The paper which I hold in my hand, leaving out those words, was laid on our desks yesterday morning and what I have just read occurred the evening before last. This paper is printed officially and correctly, leaving out the words "needy and disabled," but providing for the grant of pensions absolute as to all, and there certainly was no agreement yesterday to limit it. I have read the remarks that were made the evening before last, and the Senator from South Carolina if he were in his seat would surely corroborate my statement that no agreement modifying his amendment was reached. The RECORD shows that none was reached. So when I spoke I——

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator will pardon me for calling his attention to the paper I read from, ordered to be printed on the 8th of February.

Mr. BECK. So was this ordered to be printed on the 8th of February; the one I hold in my hand is correct, and I so treated it in my speech. The RECORD shows that those words of limitation were not in the amendment. The speech I made yesterday was based on the fact that those words were not in it. This is the language I used yesterday in the remarks for which I am now criticised:

> I had supposed that the pension law of a country was to provide for men who were needy, for men or their families who were either suffering or who could not well live in comfort without the bounty of the Government being bestowed upon them; and that class of men everybody is willing to provide for, as far as we can; but when you embrace all classes and conditions of men, soldiers of the Mexican war, soldiers of the war of the rebellion, soldiers of the Indian wars, the questions very naturally arise what is the use of it, and where is the money to come from? for they will all finally get arrears.

Would I have made that statement if the words needy and disabled had been in the amendment? Of course not. Why, sir, there is not a man in the Senate who will go further than I will to pension every needy and deserving Mexican soldier. Kentucky has honored the Mexican soldiers in every way. The Kentucky Legislature last winter directed my colleague and myself to vote for pensioning them. He introduced the bill, and I stood by him to the end on every amendment to it. But when I saw arrears of pensions claimed as a principle, and heard it proclaimed here to be unjust to withhold arrears, and the ground taken in this amendment that every man is to be pensioned whether he fought or not in the Mexican war, so he went there, as thousands did who never heard a gun fired, and is to go back to the end of that war and claims arrears of pension, and this move is to be followed by pensioning every man who ever served in the Federal Army against the South, or the Indians, or anybody, so that nearly 4,000,000 men in the last war alone, as the Senator from Kansas said the other day, on this principle are to have arrears, I saw nothing but bankruptcy to the country, and a squandering of the people's money on a false principle. I will vote for every needy pensioner. Kentucky demands it. The Senator from Texas might have spoken for an hour as eloquently as he did for the twenty minutes he held the floor as to what Kentucky desired for her needy and disabled soldiers, and I should indorse it all and stand by it all, and go as far as he will to keep them from want; but Kentucky does not propose to be taxed to put money into the pockets of men who neither need nor deserve aid. We have to stop this pension business somewhere.

Thirteen hundred and odd millions the Senator from Kansas said the present arrears of pensions act would take before we got through with it—as much as the national debt almost to-day. Men who are rich, who are well off, ought not now, in the present condition of things, to be demanding us by resolution to vote pensions to them. Confine it to the needy and the deserving, and I will vote every dollar necessary to support every needy man who fought the battles of his country. My people expect me to do it, but at the same time I must take care now when arrears of pensions are demanded for all, and all limitations are to be stricken out, that we have a stopping-place somewhere, and the stopping-place is when you have provided for the needy and the deserving, and the gentlemen who are rich and well off will not, I think, ask it when the question is fairly presented and the necessities of the country are made known.

The Senator from Kansas took exception to the action of two or three gentlemen in the other House who are seeking to repeal or modify the present arrears of pensions act, and seemed to think there were only two or three of them in that body, and they confederates. Why, sir, when that bill was passed there were sixty-two members voted against the arrears of pensions bill. Every Representative from Kentucky voted against it but one, and he is not here now—Mr. Turner; every Representative from Texas voted against it. I see that the present governor of Missouri, Mr. Crittenden, voted against it. Sixty-two Representatives cast their votes against it, and so far from all the men of the South demanding that that bill should pass, as seems now to be assumed here, I cannot find half a dozen names from the South among those who voted in the affirmative in the House, but I can find nearly all the men from my region of country voting against it. The Senator from Kansas is greatly mistaken if he thinks there was no opposition except from one or two confederates, and Southern Senators are equally mistaken about the sentiments of Southern Representatives. I will insert the names of the men who voted against the bill at the time, sixty-two of them:

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the Senator from Kentucky to say in his speech the other day that the bill was put through under the gag law.

Mr. BECK. It was; but the yeas and nays were called, that was all that was allowed.

Mr. INGALLS. There were votes against it.

Mr. BECK. Sixty-two, including all the men from Kentucky but one.

Mr. INGALLS. There does not seem to have been anybody scared in the House.

Mr. BECK. There were 64 who did not vote at all, and 164 voted for it, and you seem extremely unwilling to give them a chance at it again. Do not gag them by passing a resolution in advance, telling them it is no use to do anything. If they had a chance you would find more than 64 voting for a repeal or for very important modifications. Of course nobody there then knew what was going to happen, either in regard to frauds or to the enormous amount, any more than we did here.

This is all I desire to say. When I spoke yesterday I believed, and I believed after reading from the RECORD the statement of the Senator from South Carolina, that he had declined to modify his amendment, as had been requested by the Senator from Kansas, limiting it to the needy and disabled. The RECORD shows that he had so declined. The resolution laid on my table and the only one I ever saw until this morning made no exception supplementing this broad demand. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] sought to pension all the men who had enlisted in the Indian wars, whether wounded, disabled, needy, or not. I had heard the principle announced over and over again on this floor that arrears of pensions ought to apply to all entitled to pensions. I saw that if we went back to the Mexican war and gave arrears of pensions, as I know from information many of them are demanding, this country would be bankrupt; and if the Indian wars are included—and all the soldiers of the war or the rebellion will of course demand the same thing—Congress cannot, with all the enormous tariff taxation it imposes, raise revenue enough to pay pensions, far less to carry on the Government. The whole pension business had better be carefully revised or it will break down with its own weight. At the same time I declare now that if these amendments are accepted which were read by the Senator from Texas confining it to the needy and disabled, whenever a bill comes up in the proper form I will vote for it and advocate it and stand by it as long as any man in the Senate; and I will perhaps go further than most men in that direction in needy and deserving cases. I never have voted against a pension that I believed a needy man required, and I do not think I ever shall; but it does not follow that I shall declare in advance that I will vote for pensions for everybody and everything, even if it bankrupts the country, and even if the money goes into the pockets of men who do not need it. That is what I object to almost as much as I do to the frauds perpetrated under the present system of arrears. It is a perversion of all the principles upon which pensions are founded, and if persisted in will break down even cases that ought to be sustained.

TARIFF AND TAX COMMISSION.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I renew my motion to lay aside the unfinished business and take up the tariff commission bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate lay aside the pending business temporarily with a view to taking up the measure indicated by the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 22) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] on Tuesday last used the following language:

> The word protection should be expunged from our vocabulary. It means monopoly; it means exclusive privilege; it means subsidy; it means that all shall be taxed and made to pay tribute to the favored few. It means combinations and lobbyists; a diversion of legislation from legitimate channels—from the great public interest to the interests of a few favored ones. It means a wholesale robbery of the people, and especially of the American workingman, in whose behalf it is invoked.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] in his speech, indicated very clearly that his opinion was, that protection was simply a pliant tool of New England monopolists, and his colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] succeeding him, declared that it was a legalized tyranny. Mr. President, you may consult the Democratic party for the last sixty years, go back to the heyday when Mr. Hayne, of South Carolina, declared in the United States Senate, that protection would prove to the country worse than an Egyptian plague, and that free-trade would abound in blessings next to the Christian religion, and come down to now, and you will find that it has denounced a protective tariff as "robbery," as "plunder," as "a system of swindling," as "a means by which to make the rich richer and the poor poorer," as a specter grim and ghastly which takes its place at the head of every poor man's breakfast-table, which scowls at him every time he lights his pipe, and yet, sir, right in the teeth of these savage denunciations, fidelity to truth compels me to declare that I am a protectionist from principle. If there was no public debt, no interest to pay, no pension list, no army and no navy to support, I still should oppose free trade and its twin sister, "tariff for revenue only," and favor protective duties.

Mr. President, it seems to me that protection is absolutely essential to the encouragement of capital, and equally necessary for the protection of the American laborer. Capital needs the former more than the latter, I admit, for capital can easily take care of itself. If it gains no adequate returns in one business, it can readily seek it in another; if it reaps no profit at home, may try new fields abroad; may even let all effort alone, hide itself in Government bonds, and, enthroned there in perfect security, draw regularly its interest. Capital, too, is fearfully timid. The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] a few days since declared that there was nothing in the world so easily frightened as money. And yet the prosperity of the country imperatively demands its constant use, its investment in every industrial enterprise. The opening of mines, the forcing from the hiding places of the earth coal, iron, and copper, the smelting of ores, the erection of forges, founderies and factories, the employment of men who must work or starve, demand its help. To inspire it with the requisite courage, to induce it to a useful activity, I would encourage it. But the labor of this country beyond that of any other demands protection against the cheap labor of Europe, for the laborer here has responsibilities, duties, and necessities unknown there. His wages can never go down to theirs without absolute destruction to him and imminent danger to the Republic. The large majority of our men must earn their bread by the sweat of the brow. Under our Constitution they are the Government. How can hungry men govern? How can a half-paid, half-fed, half-educated citizen rightly and intelligently understand and perform the duties of citizenship? He must have good food, enough of it, good clothing, school houses for his children, comforts for his home, and a fair chance to improve his condition. To this end I would protect him against competition with the half-paid laborers of European countries who have never enjoyed his privileges, experienced his comforts, shared his duties and responsibilities, to whom his very necessities would seem luxuries.

The Senator from Texas joins issue with me on this question of labor, and in the same speech declares:

> But it is said that much higher wages are paid to American operatives than to European workmen, and that to enable the manufacturers to pay these higher wages they must have a protective as distinguished from a purely revenue tariff, in order to exclude European competition. Do American manufacturers pay their operatives higher wages? Nominally and ostensibly they do, but really and in fact they do not.

That is a most amazing declaration. If it is right, I am wrong; if it is right, every conclusion of the argument of the Senator from Texas is entirely logical and legitimate. If that declaration made by the Senator is false in fact, then the three hours' argument founded upon it is an entire fallacy. Now, sir, I hold in my hand a book entitled "The State of Labor in Europe," printed by authority of Congress, "reports from United States consuls," and the Senator from Texas may take it, turn from blank leaf to blank leaf, he may read every page from beginning to end, and I defy him to point to one single statement of fact, to one single table of statistics, which does not prove conclusively that his statement is not correct and that labor in Europe is paid from one-half to two-thirds less than it is in America to-day.

Again, I have now in my hand a book entitled "Labor in Europe and America," by Mr. Young, chief of the United States Bureau of Statistics. Let the Senator take this, turn it from blank leaf to blank leaf, and he cannot find a single fact stated in the whole book which justifies his statement.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. I referred in my argument to the letter of Mr. Secretary Blaine in the book called The Cotton-Goods Trade of the World, commenting upon the reports of consuls. I referred also to the letter of Mr. Secretary Evarts, transmitting the reports of consuls, and I assert that these gentlemen, after an examination of these reports, do say in those letters, Mr. Blaine specifically, that the wages of European and American operatives are more than equalized, and Mr. Secretary Evarts says in the conclusions that he draws from the reports of consuls that wages in Europe and America are equalized. I aver that to be the fact, and refer to those books in proof of it.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I take the very last report which Secretary Evarts sent to Congress and I ask the Senator to examine every page and he will agree with me, that if Mr. Evarts ever did say that the labor in Europe was as well paid as the labor in America nothing in this book can be found on which that statement can be justified.

Mr. COKE. I can show to the honorable Senator from Maine that Mr. Evarts says that the testimony proves conclusively that the American workman does from one and a half to twice as much labor as the European operative does. Now, take that estimate of the amount of labor he performs and the results he accomplishes and then take the wages and see where the highest wages are paid.

Mr. FRYE. If the Secretary's statement is true that the American laborer does from one-half to two-thirds more labor in a day than the English laborer does, it only proves that the American laborer is better fed, is better clothed, lives in a more comfortable house, is better educated in our schools, and has attained all these things by a good use of his higher wages.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him, does he controvert that Mr. Secretary Evarts has said that in the letter to which I referred?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I must, from want of time, decline further to yield to the Senator from Texas. I repeat the statement I made, that the Senator may take the last report which Secretary Evarts sent to Congress, and I have the tables right before me and will annex them to my speech, and I say he cannot find one single statement from a consul justifying any such conclusion as Mr. Evarts is said to have arrived at. Of course I do not mean to assert that the Senator has not correctly quoted Mr. Evarts's letter.

Now, Mr. President, I do not propose to rely entirely upon consular reports. I am aware of some difficulties attending the getting at labor statistics in England and France and Belgium and Germany. Let an American consul go to the superintendent of an English mill, step into the counting-room, and ask him for his price-list paid for wages for his laborers; will he be treated politely; will he receive the same kind of treatment he would in America? By no manner of means. They are determined, if possible, that information as to wages shall not go out. I am willing to admit that in some favored localities, in some particular class of work, for instance, if you take some of the most skilled spinners and weavers in an English cotton-mill and in an English woolen-mill, you will find that for two or three in a room the wages will come nearly up to the wages in an American cotton or woolen mill; but you take the wages of the laborers right through the mill, and I defy any man on earth to show that they are not as much as one-half below the wages in the cotton and woolen mills or America.

I do not rely upon these consular statements alone; I happen to know men in this country who own mills in Great Britain and in the United States, who hire laborers there and here, and I obtained from them information so that there could be no mistake about this. The Senator from Texas must remember that wages paid to the operatives in the cotton-factory by no means represent the cost of manufacturing. The cost of the mill and machinery, of the coal and gas, 90 per cent. of which is labor, and the taxes upon the property must come into that computation.

Now, sir, as to the comparative cost of mills in the two countries, I call in evidence the statement of the treasurer of Conant Thread Company, of Pawtucket, Rhode Island. They own and run thread-mills in Great Britain as well as here:

OFFICE OF THE CONANT THREAD COMPANY,
Pawtucket, Rhode Island, January 19, 1882.

In reply to yours of the 18th, we can say that, from the best data we can obtain, the cost of building and equipping a cotton factory in New England, as compared with the cost of a similar structure in Lancashire or Scotland, is just about double, or, to give a few figures, a new fire-proof brick structure, furnished with steam-power and all necessary adjuncts, in shape of store-houses and accessories, containing 50,000 to 80,000 spindles, spinning, with all prepared machinery complete for spinning, 60*s*. to 120*s*. yarns, land and all, can be furnished in Lancashire to-day for twenty-two to twenty-four shillings per spindle.

In Rhode Island the same will cost $12 to $15 dollars per spindle.

Trusting this will be satisfactory, we remain,

Yours truly,

CONANT THREAD COMPANY,
H. CONANT, Treasurer.

Again, I have a letter from Mr. Wyckoff, secretary of The Silk Association of America, in which he says:

A silk-factory built in Coventry or Macclesfield, of the same size and floor capacity as one here, would cost about 60 to 65 per cent. as much. For instance, a three-story building, 200 by 50, with engine-house, might cost there £3,500; here about thirty thousand dollars.

Again, I have a letter from the Clark Thread Company, of Newark, New Jersey, and they run and own mills in Great Britain as well as here:

P. S.—Erecting a factory, including buildings and machinery, in Newark will cost 80 to 85 per cent. more than in Paisley.

Yours, respectfully,

CLARK THREAD COMPANY,
WILLIAM CLARK,
Superintendent.

James Coates, of J. & P. Coates, the largest thread manufacturers in the world, owning and running mills abroad and here, says:

To the best of my judgment and experience, a factory would cost fully twice as much to build here as in Scotland.

I have here the Deutsche Industrie Zeitung of June, 1881, the organ of the Chamber of Commerce and Industry for Chemistry in Dresden, regarded as the highest authority, I believe, in Europe, which shows—

The cost per spindle of constructing mills: England, $5.79 to $7.78; France, $8.69 to $9.65; Germany, $8.69 to $9.65;

while the cost in the United States is $12 to $18.

Mr. Coates further says:

The great difference in wages between the two countries affects the prices of the various descriptions of supplies required in a factory in a corresponding ratio, and coal and gas are very much lower in Scotland than here, not to speak of the average rate of interest. Coal is laid at our furnaces there for three and ninepence per ton, equal to about 90 cents; it is, of course, small coal, but well adapted for handling with the automatic stoker, and gives as good results as the coal used here which averaged last year $4.70, laid down at the works. The price of 25-candle power gas is three and ninepence per 1,000 cubic feet, equal to 90 cents, and taxes are less than one-third of what we pay here.

Mr. President, what makes that difference in cost? Remember that the mill, the coal, the gas, are all 90 per cent. labor. Remember that the trees in our forests, the clay in our banks, the stone and slate in our quarries, the coal in our mines, are certainly as cheap as in Europe; and remembering these things, will the Senator from Texas tell me what makes the mills here cost twice as much as they cost there? It is because 90 per cent. of the cost is labor, and the labor there is paid only one-half as much as labor here, and no other reason can be suggested or given.

But, Mr. President, as to the wages of the operatives. Again I cite the Clark Thread Company. I have their pay-roll in Scotland and here, and there can be no mistake, I take it, about that. Mr. Clark says:

CLARK THREAD COMPANY, NEWARK, N. J.,
January 25, 1882.

DEAR SIR: As requested, we herewith send you a list of wages paid the workers in Clark & Co.'s, Paisley, Scotland, and the wages paid the same class of workers in Newark, N. J.:

Employés.	Paisley, Scotland.	Newark, N. J.
Girls:	Per week.	Per week.
Spoolers	$3 50 to $3 75	$7 00 to $9 00
Reelers	3 50 to 3 75	7 50 to 8 50
Cop-winders	3 50 to 3 75	7 50 to 8 50
Twisters	2 25 to 2 50	5 00 to 6 00
Strippers	1 50 to 1 75	3 00 to 3 00
Bobbin cleaner	1 25 to ——	2 50 to 2 50
Men:
Carpenters	7 00 to 7 50	16 50 to 18 00
Machinists	7 00 to 7 50	16 50 to 18 00
Dyers	7 00 to 7 00	15 00 to 15 00
Bleachers	6 50 to 6 50	13 50 to 13 50
Firemen	6 00 to 6 00	12 00 to 13 00

The above is, to the best of my knowledge, correct.

Mr. Coates says:

PAWTUCKET, RHODE ISLAND, February 2, 1882.

DEAR SIR: I have to acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 24th ultimo, and in reply have the pleasure to hand you comparative rates of wages paid in our factories here and in Scotland.

Our manufacture is a specialty, requiring the employment of good, steady hands, it being impossible for us to maintain the quality of our goods with a floating class of help. The general average of female help in Scotland, you will observe, is under $3 a week, whereas here it averages $7.50 per week. (Remember the difference in the time run between the two countries is deducted from the rates paid here to make the comparison more correct.) The difference in male help is not so great, but the great bulk of those we employ are females. We are obliged to pay higher wages, as we have to employ help corresponding to the best class engaged in weaving and other highly paid departments of labor. Unless we do so, we find our help unwilling to remain with us steadily, subject to the strict discipline necessary to produce our quality of goods. These conditions apply to Scotland as well as here, where our experience proves the help to be quite as efficient and able to attend to as many machines or spindles.

I deduct from the wages paid here an amount corresponding to the difference of time run during the week in the two countries.

Trusting that the information given sufficiently covers the ground, as it represents the great mass of our employés,

I am yours, very respectfully,

JAMES COATES,
Of J. & P. Coates.

Wages paid operatives per week.

Operatives.	United States.	Scotland.	Difference. Amount.	Difference. Per cent.
Spoolers	$6 59	$3 40	$3 19	94
Twister-tenders	5 69	2 55	3 14	123
Doffers	4 37	1 94	2 43	125
Cleaners	2 63	1 52	1 11	73
Reelers	7 88	3 52	4 36	124
Winders	7 25	2 80	4 45	159
Wrappers and boxers	7 96	3 04	4 92	162
Dyers	9 84	6 32	3 52	56
Bleachers, men	11 81	5 10	6 71	133
Bleachers, women	5 25	2 43	2 82	116
Mechanics	13 13	7 94	5 19	65
Firemen	10 66	5 83	4 83	83

These letters, coming from men who know whereof they affirm, show by their tables the wages paid the operatives in the two countries.

About it there can be no mistake, for the same men pay the wages there and here. This conclusively shows that in Europe the laborers do not receive one-half as much pay as do ours, and yet the Senator from Texas declares they are paid alike.

Let me ask the Senator from Texas why is it that 11,000,000 men and women have left Europe, nearly all of them laborers, and have sought our shores? Why is it that not 200,000 of them have ever returned to Europe? Why is it that last year 700,000 laborers from Europe came to our country? Why is it that 50,000 came from England, the highest wage-paying country in Europe? Why is it that you cannot go into a cotton-mill or woolen-mill in America to-day and not find on the pay-roll scores of English mule-spinners and card-strippers and dyers; and why is it that they never go home, but the moment they lay aside enough from their high wages they send for their brothers, their fathers, their wives, and their children to come out too?

Sir, Europe has 312,000,000 inhabitants, Massachusetts has 1,700,000. Europe has 184 times as many inhabitants as Massachusetts. Both are laboring communities, both engaged principally in manufactures. Why is it that in Massachusetts the laborers have $231,000,000 of money in the savings-banks, one-seventh as much as the whole 312,000,000 in Europe in their savings-banks, postal and other. Why is it that in the North alone—leaving out the South only because she has few if any savings-banks—why is it in the States excluding the South, having a population of about thirty millions or thirty-five millions, they have $200,000,000 more in the savings-banks than they have in all Europe with its 312,000,000 of people?

Sir, to-day, in this nineteenth century, when most men, thank God, can read and write, it will not do to tell the American people that the wages in Europe are as high as the wages in America. I am not yet convinced, and am still a protectionist. The Senator from Kentucky sitting near me [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the other Democratic Senators and the Democratic party sharply join issue with me and say, "No robbery, no plunder, no system of swindling; we are for free trade; we are for a tariff for revenue only."

Mr. President, what are free trade and a tariff for revenue only? They are one and the same, now and forever, as inseparable as Siamese twins.

Free trade is the admission into our ports, the discharge upon our wharves, the offering in our markets the products and manufactures of the world, regardless of mere cost, regardless of the amount of labor entering into them and of the price paid for that labor, regardless, too, of the effect upon our industries. By it France, Germany, Belgium, and England are solicited to bring into our markets their silks, cottons, woolens, linens, manufactures of iron and steel, the products of the loom, the forge, and the farm, on the production of which the labor expended has cost from one-quarter to two-thirds of what we should have been compelled to expend in producing the same.

WHAT IS A TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY?

I suppose that England has such a tariff more nearly than any other country, but even her free-trade theories allow her to protect her manufacturers by an increased duty upon her manufactured article.

The chief items of receipt under the head of customs duties for England during the past year were, from—

Chicory	$360,000
Cocoa	230,000
Coffee	1,625,000
Currants	1,380,000
Figs	130,000
Raisins	775,000
Rum	11,510,000
Brandy	7,935,000
Tea	18,500,000
Tobacco and snuff	43,000,000
Wine	7,000,000

The revenue from these duties last year was $96,000,000; almost, if not quite, as much per capita as we receive from our tariff. Undoubtedly the party which has such a holy horror of "monopolies," of "New England capitalists," of "thieving manufacturers," and would never protect except when the necessary revenue compelled it, would copy after this great free-trade model, and raise this revenue from tea, coffee, chicory, cocoa—upon whatever we must have and do not raise or make. With a strange inconsistency, however, they would collect forty-five millions annually from sugar, rice, and hemp, raised in the South, and therefore protected without any violation of Democratic free-trade principles. If they undertook to raise the revenue by duties upon manufactured articles, those duties would necessarily be so low as not only to enable the foreign manufacturer to compete with ours, but to undersell him, so as to induce large importations and realize great revenues. The only way open to us for a continuance of employment would be a reduction in the wages of the employed. I have had some experience on the House Committee on Ways and Means, and know what my Democratic friends mean by a "tariff for revenue only."

I have no hesitation in declaring that a tariff for revenue only—that is, a tariff law under whose provisions the largest amount of revenue can be raised in the easiest manner for the Government—would be more disastrous to our people than free trade, for, while it would leave open and free competition to all countries in everything we raise or manufacture, it would increase the cost of those we cannot and yet must have, the factor of competition being left out.

WHO ARE THE ADVOCATES OF FREE TRADE?

The only prominent champions of free trade to-day in the world are England and the Democratic party of the United States. Amazing co-partnership! For centuries England was the most earnest, vigorous, and determined champion of protection the world ever saw, enforced the extremest doctrines by all the powers of war and all the arts of diplomacy. She destroyed the growing commerce of Ireland by one blow of her navigation laws, repressed her cattle raising, her wool growing, her manufactures, and made her the waste of to-day. She attempted the same rôle in America; forbade the exportation of her products to any country other than her own; forced all of the carrying trade into English bottoms; repressed all manufactures of fabrics, and provided by law "that none of the American colonies should manufacture iron of any kind; that no smith should make a bolt, spike, or nail, bar or rod iron; that no mill or other engine for rolling iron or furnace for making steel should be permitted;" finally drove us to revolution and lost the brightest jewel from her diadem. This spirit of repression in the interests of protection controlled her conduct with all of her colonies. Nor did England confine this policy to them alone, but by every art and device known to war and peace she protected and encouraged her manufactures, strengthened and extended her commerce at the expense of every nation she could frighten or cajole. By fraud, diplomacy, and war, by repression, protection, and prohibition resorted to for centuries with a persistency and determination which never wavered, England found herself "mistress of the seas" and manufacturer for the world. Then with an accumulated capital no other country possessed, with skilled artisans kept at home by laws forbidding emigration, with machinery far in advance of any other nation, with a merchant marine capable of doing the carrying trade for the universe, with the key to the whole situation in her own hands, as she thought, England suddenly discovered the charms of "free trade," opened her own ports, and demanded reciprocity. Was this new light? Had she found herself in the wrong during all these years of wonderful growth and to do works meet for repentance, to repair the wrongs inflicted upon the other nations of the earth, did she determine upon this new policy? By no manner of means. She only counted herself able, with the advantages she possessed, to compete with the world successfully to herself—to hold her own markets and gain theirs. Well may she to-day, with her Cobden Club, and with every device of which she is so cunning a manipulator, join with the Democratic party in a crusade against our industries. With her overflowing population, with a production one-quarter of which she cannot consume at home, with a third of her spindles idle, with protection against her manufactures in almost every country, even in her colonies of Australia and Canada, well may she champion the cause of "free trade" in this Republic with her fifty millions of people. To succeed and to accomplish her purpose would be the crowning glory of her great industrial career.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

Now, Mr. President, as to this other champion of "free trade"—the Democratic party. How does it happen that this party of capital at the South and labor at the North should champion such a cause? It claims to surpassing love for the poor man, deadly hatred to the rich; it rolls over its tongue as a sweet morsel "bloated bondholders," "national-bank robbers," "corrupt and corrupting corporations." In season and out of season it proclaims its devotion to "the poor downtrodden people;" and yet, singularly enough, its savage animosity to "protection" and its intense love for "free trade" were born of its unswerving devotion to slavery, its fixed determination to keep degraded labor still in its degradation, to maintain unpaid toil still unpaid. For the North it only desired one thing, that it might become a great farm; for its laborers, that they might become farmers, whose sole business in life should be the sowing of seed and the reaping of harvests to supply the slaves of the South with cheap food. Allow me, sir, to quote from a standard authority in the South, from "Cotton is King," a book published in Georgia in 1860 by subscription alone, edited by Dr. Elliot, president of Planters' College, in Mississippi; and to give it the seal of inspiration I call the attention of my Democratic friends to some words of its author in his preface:

> The author would here repeat that the main object he had in view in the preparation of Cotton is King was to convince the Abolitionists of the utter failure of their plans.

Again:

> What Divine Providence may have in store for the future we know not; but at present the institution of slavery is sustained by numberless pillars, too massive for human power and wisdom to overthrow.

This, of course, clothes with undoubted authority whatever he writes. He declares:

> The opposition to a protective tariff by the South arose from two causes: first, to secure the foreign market for its cotton; second, to obtain an abundance of supplies at a cheap rate. Let a system of free trade be adopted, the South would constitute the principal market for, and the fertile lands of the North supply, the cheap food demanded for its slaves.

Again:

> If they could establish free trade, it would secure the American market to foreign manufactures, secure the foreign markets for their leading staples, force Northern men into agriculture, multiply the growth and decrease the price of provisions, feed and clothe their slaves at lower rates.

Again:

There was a fusion of interests between the planters of the United States and the British manufacturers, and to the planters the copartnership has been eminently advantageous.

Mr. Clay, in 1824 in the Senate, discussing the tariff, said:

The existing state of things presents a sort of tacit compact between the cotton-grower and the British manufacturer, the stipulations of which are, on the part of the cotton-grower, that the whole of the United States, the other portions as well as the cotton-growing, shall remain open and unrestricted in the consumption of British manufactures; and on the part of the British manufacturer, that in consideration thereof he will continue to purchase the cotton of the South.

On reviewing the great debates on the tariff from 1824 forward for ten years, it will be seen that Hayne, Hamilton, McDuffy, Wickliffe, Benton, Rankin, Garnett, Cuthbert, and others, leaders in the Democratic party, opposed the protective policy on the ground that cotton was the king, and ought by right to be; from a desire for a market, a fear of retaliation if we protected against English manufactures, cheap food for the slaves, &c. One of their leading statesmen said:

We must prevent the increase of manufactories, force the surplus labor into agriculture, promote the cultivation of our unimproved western lands, until provisions are so multiplied and reduced in price that the slave can be fed so cheaply as to enable us to grow our sugar at three cents a pound.

Mr. Clay rebuked this strangely selfish spirit:

The gentleman would have us abstain from adopting a policy called for by the interests of the greater and freer part of the population. But is that reasonable? Can it be expected that the interests of the greater part should be made to bend to the condition of the servile part of our population? That in effect would be to make us the slaves of slaves.

In the interests of slavery, of cheap labor, and cheap living for the slaves, South Carolina rejected Mr. Clay's tariff, determined to resist its enforcement, nullified its provisions, and refused to allow its execution within her borders. What a choice feast this Democratic party was spreading for our northern farmer, manufacturer, and laborer. And yet the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] with dramatic solemnity, declares that protection is terribly selfish! But what of free trade, so advocated? The whole North to feed slaves! Is it not passing strange that the Democratic laborers of the North, hundreds of thousands of them exiles from Ireland, forced from home by British free trade, should have joined hands with the Democratic planters and capitalists of the South in this shameless attempt to compel them to become hewers of wood and drawers of water for their slaves? It came, I suppose, from force of habit. It was brawn yielding to brain. The wealth and intelligence, the political head of the party, was always in the South. The Northern wing was always obedient to its imperious will; as in everything else, so in this. But slavery died twenty years ago, and no Southern gentleman desires its resurrection. The predictions of these distinguished Southern statesmen have all proved disastrous failures. There is ample market for cotton, and, though no slaves, larger crops than ever are gathered, and a protective tariff still lives. Why, then, no change in political sentiment? Still the force of habit. The leopard changes not his spots nor the Ethiopian his skin. But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] announces to the Senate that the party is progressive; that he is not for free trade, but "for a tariff for revenue only," and during the last Presidential campaign, when his party was being driven to the wall on this issue, prominent Democrats in New England declared the same, assured the people that they were no free traders; that they surely would do no harm to the laborers, and had no purpose to crush our manufactures. Are they sincere in this? Who ever heard one of them declare in favor of protection?

I have listened to many discussions of the tariff within the last ten years in Congress, and the animosity of the Democratic leaders toward protection has never been concealed. I give a few extracts from their speeches, indicating what tender nurses they would be for a tariff. In 1866, Mr. Marshall, of Illinois, a leading Democrat, member of the Committee on Ways and Means, speaking of the tariff, said:

In all ages of the world there has been an effort by legislative jugglery to rob the toiling millions, build up a favored class who could riot in unbounded wealth wrung from the hard earnings of labor.

Again, he declares that "the Democratic party was organized and formed to protect the people from such legislative robbery."

Dr. Elliot, as I have shown, furnishes the key to this in his statement that it was organized to secure to the slaves of the South cheap food from the North.

Mr. Marshall, in the same speech, calls the friends of the tariff "plunderers," "robbers," and declares that the dignity of the House alone restrains him from speaking the whole truth.

Hon. Mr. Kerr, subsequently Democratic Speaker of the House, discussing the same bill, says:

I arise for the purpose of uttering my solemn protest against the infamous and irreparable crime which this House threatens to perpetrate against the liberties of the people of this country by the passage of this bill.

He also speaks of our protective policy as "vicious," of "protective-tariff swindles," of "our unwise, dishonest, and vicious protective system," "infamous system," and concludes his speech, "if our country is ever to become prosperous and happy again, it will be after a return" "to the rational revenue systems of her better days," meaning, I suppose, that system which was to make the North a great feeder of slaves.

Senator Hamilton, in the Forty-second Congress, said of protection:

It is a firmly formed, rotund, impressive, seductive word, gaudily, nay richly, attired, vailed even as the Prophet of Khorassin, but when stripped presents features narrow and contracted, repulsive, with low cunning, morbid selfishness, base instincts. There is nothing in it broad, nor good, nor benevolent, nor liberal.

Said Mr. Crossland:

God speed the day when all the doors of commerce shall be thrown open, all its shackles knocked off, and all the nations of the earth invited to come into our ports—to bring to our markets their manufactures free of taxation, and bid against each other for our products.

Senator JOHNSTON, of Virginia:

Sir, I am opposed to this protective system; I favor free trade.

And this is the honorable Senator's definition of protection:

It is a cunningly-devised scheme, by which a portion, and but a small portion, of the community, under the pretense of raising revenue for the support of the Government, get rich at the expense of a large majority of the people.

Mr. Lamison, of the House, declared his belief in free trade, and said:

The prosperity of the country will be increased if all our ports are thrown open and the commerce of the world is invited to unload its cargoes without the payment of one dollar of duty.

In a tariff discussion in 1880 Messrs. Morrison, COX, and MILLS declared themselves "free-traders."

Hon. Mr. Muldrow talked about protection having "its iron fingers on the throat of every man."

Hon. Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said:

The lowest rate of duty on every article which will produce the required revenue is my idea of a revenue tariff.

Hon. Mr. MCKENZIE, of Kentucky, said:

This tariff system was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity. It derives its name from Tariffa, where, during the Moorish domination in Spain, exactions from every passing vessel were made. Our American system * * * is as downright and unquestionable robbery as it was on the part of the Moors to extort tribute from the unlucky merchant.

And I might go on with such morsels for the day, but it seems to me here is enough to satisfy any man that it will not be a prudent and judicious act to put our protective policy out to the tender care of such a wet-nurse as this. How strangely alike are the discussions of that earlier day and these of the last ten years, the same fearful prophecies of woe to the land, of destruction to the country, of sorrow to the poor, of starvation to the laborer, if protection prevailed. It did then, and what followed? Let Mr. Clay, speaking in 1832, say:

I have now to perform the more pleasing task of exhibiting an imperfect sketch of the existing state of the unparalleled prosperity of the country. On a general survey we behold cultivation extended; the arts flourishing; the face of the country improved; our people fully and profitably employed, and the public countenance exhibiting tranquillity, contentment, and happiness. And, if we descend into particulars, we have the agreeable contemplation of a people out of debt; land rising slowly in value, but in a secure and salutary degree; a ready, though not an extravagant, market for all the surplus productions of our industry; innumerable flocks and herds browsing and gamboling on ten thousand hills and plains covered with rich and verdant grasses; our cities expanded, and whole villages springing up, as it were, by enchantment; our exports and imports increased and increasing; our tonnage, foreign and coastwise, swelled and fully occupied; the rivers of our interior animated by the perpetual thunder and lightning of countless steamboats; the currency sound and abundant; the public debt of two wars nearly redeemed; and, to crown all, the public Treasury overflowing, embarrassing Congress, not to find subjects of taxation, but to select the objects which shall be liberated from the impost. If the term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which this people have enjoyed since the establishment of their present Constitution, it would be exactly that period of seven years which immediately followed the passage of the tariff of 1824.

A protective tariff prevailed, too, notwithstanding the denunciations and evil prophecies of these latter-day Democratic saints, and what followed? I let Dr. Loring, Commissioner of Agriculture, in a speech recently made at Boston, reply:

This Republic has increased in population at the rate of a million a year during the last decade, rivaling now every country in the world except Russia. It is not necessary to go back a half a century, or even twenty-five years, to obtain the most gratifying evidence of our progress in the work of tilling the soil. But starting in 1870, at which time we had reached an enormous production in proportion to our population, let us make our comparisons with the returns of 1880. In 1870 the amount of cotton produced was 4,352,317 bales; in 1880 more than 6,000,000 bales. In 1870 the amount of Indian corn raised was 760,940,594 bushels; in 1880, 1,754,449,435 bushels. In 1870 the wheat crop was 287,745,626 bushels; in 1880 it was 459,667,022 bushels. In 1870 the crop of oats reached 282,107,157 bushels; in 1880, 407,859,033. In 1870 the tobacco crop amounted to 262,735,341 pounds; in 1880 it amounted to 473,107,573 pounds. The increase of agricultural products was nearly one hundred per cent. in these ten years, and in the last year of this decade, from 1879 to 1880, out of this vast increase of our crops and products, our cattle export rose from $13,000,000 to $14,000,000; corn, from $43,000,000 to $50,500,000; wheat, from $167,698,000 to $190,546,000; flour, from $35,000,000 to $45,000,000; cotton, from $209,852,000 to $245,534,391; beef, from $7,000,000 to $12,000,000; lard, from $28,000,000, to $33,000,000; and pork, from $5,000,000 to $8,000,000. Mark also the growth of American manufactures in half a century. In 1830 the amount invested in cotton manufactures was a little more than $40,000,000. Fifty years have passed away and the amount of capital invested in mills and subsidiary work is more than $225,000,000. Of our woolen manufactures the statistics are more imperfect, but I have ascertained that in 1840 the value of the product was $20,696,699, and in 1880 the value of woolens, worsteds, carpets, and hosiery produced was $234,587,671. In 1870 the silk productions of the United States were valued at $12,210,662; in 1880, at $34,410,463. Fifty years ago the shoe and leather industry had hardly a national reputation. In 1870, however, there were 4,237 tanneries in the United States, employing a capital of $42,710,505 annually, and producing leather valed at $86,160,883. The growth of the iron and steel industry has been equally remarkable. In 1810 we produced only 50,000 tons of iron, and our largest furnace could yield only 1,100 tons annually. But in 1830 the product was 165,000 tons; in 1860, 1,000,000 tons; in 1880 the iron and steel works in the United States produced 7,265,100 tons.

The aggregate annual product of our manufacturing and mechanical industries is now more than six thousand millions of dollars. Of this vast product less than two hundred millions are exported. And of the $900,000,000 produced by agriculture, less than 10 per cent. is exported. On the self-supporting power of the American people, and of the mutual relations existing between our industries, we can dwell as Americans with the most profound satisfaction.

"The wildest enthusiast for protection in 1824 never dreamed of any such marvelous progress in industrial prosperity as this. I have referred to two eras of protection and the unparalleled prosperity of both no man can gainsay. I know that free-traders tauntingly point to 1873, its panic and subsequent hard times. But what had that to do with protection? Its causes are familiar to every Senator, and I do not propose to enter upon a discussion of the war, an inflated currency, wild speculations resultant to it, and to the other causes common to other countries and ours. Why, free-trade England was worse off than we. More than half of her spindles were idle; half of her workingmen were out of employment, and she was feeding more paupers than ever before. Suppose we had had no protection against her then! She would have poured her surplus products into our markets, our manufacturers would have been literally crushed, and it would have taken many years for recovery of our position. History repeats itself. Our periods of prosperity have been the years of protection, and of adversity those of free trade; and by free trade I mean a tariff for revenue only. In 1789–1801 we had protection; in 1801–1812, free trade; in 1812–1816, protection; in 1816–1824, free trade; in 1824–1833, protection; in 1833–1842, free trade; in 1842–1847, protection; in 1847–1861, free trade; and in 1861–1881 protection again.

Take for an example those good old Democratic times from 1847 to 1860. That party found the country when they took it in a condition of healthy prosperity, placed it promptly under a tariff for revenue only, held it for twelve years, left it in debt, with its Treasury bankrupt, unable to borrow a few millions even for 12 per cent. interest, its industries almost destroyed, its courage completely paralyzed. The Republican party received it in this condition, placed it as promptly under a protective tariff, carried on a four years' war, raised billions of dollars by taxation, other billions by bonds, paid its debt for years at the rate of one hundred millions a year, reduced the rate of interest to 3½ per cent., and have it to-day in the most prosperous condition it ever enjoyed. When in the history of this or any other country has free trade proved a blessing? Now and in England, every free-trader cries. But I have already tried to show that she never could have experimented with what she calls free trade if she had not first achieved greatness and power under protection. But what are the facts? Is England prosperous to-day?

Allow me, Mr. President, to quote from a recent editorial in one of the leading New York papers statements which, so far as I have been able, I have verified:

Investigations have disclosed a state of things which abundantly justifies the dissatisfaction of British workingmen under the practical operation of free-trade doctrines, and explains the return to Parliament of men pledged to advocate the principle of reciprocity.

To begin with the silk interest, we note that the number of hands employed in Macclesfield alone has fallen in twenty years from 14,000 to 6,520. In the same period the weekly wages paid in the silk and ribbon factories has declined from $60,000 to $10,000. According to the computations of Mr. Lister, of Bradford, there has been a loss of from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 in the wages of British workmen through the silk goods imported during the last twenty years. In 1861 there were eighty-four ribbon manufacturers in Coventry; now there are not a dozen who have not been forced to compound with their creditors. The books of a large silk manufactory in Macclesfield show that his annual production was valued at $1,250,000 before the treaty with France, and that since then its average value has not reached $350,000. What is true of Macclesfield and Coventry is true also of the cotton, worsted, and lace industries in Manchester, Bradford, Nottingham, and other towns. A significant announcement appeared three months ago in the London Times, that Priestly & Sons, woolen and dress-goods makers, of Bradford, were establishing mills in Philadelphia and transferring their machinery and operatives to the United States. In Sheffield at the annual cutlers' feast on September 2 it was acknowledged that profits were a thing of the past, that wages were being continually reduced, that furnaces were being put out, and the mills worked either not at all or on half time. In Birmingham the gun trade, which has always been an important industry, has of late years been seriously depressed, and a like decline is observed in the industries concerned in turning out railway wheels and axles, and in making various kinds of fittings for railway carriages. Even the pinchbeck wares, for which Birmingham used to be notorious, are being driven out of the home market by French and Swiss importations. The decrease of production and the decline of wages are equally noticeable in the neighboring town of Wolverhampton, and in both places the operatives are beginning to attribute their distress to the competition of foreign goods, and to demand that duties shall be placed on commodities derived from those countries which impose a protective tariff upon the products of British industry. Among other English manufactures which find themselves unable to contend even in home markets with importations from the Continent should be mentioned the glove trade and the pottery trade. It is estimated that not one-third so many gloves are made in England now as were made a few years ago. The great wholesale firms sell quite as many gloves, but they are not made by English workmen. The great glove makers now have their principal workshops at Grenoble or Brussels, instead of at Worcester or Yeovil. In Staffordshire and Worcestershire, where the pottery industries are situated, we are told that depression is steadily increasing, and that the condition of the lower classes of operatives is deplorable.

That the English people are thoroughly aroused to-day on this vital question of protection I think no man will deny, and it is my firm belief that the English workingman will, before ten years have passed, have compelled the government to renounce its free trade and adopt protection.

The only country in the world I know of that has thoroughly free trade forced upon her by compulsory process is that most distracted and unfortunate land, Ireland. Before the union her manufacturing industries were protected against England by duties on woolens, silks, cotton yarn and twist, and cotton manufactured goods. Her calicoes and muslins were protected by a duty almost prohibitory, and Ireland was rapidly becoming a successful manufacturing country. Her people were happy, contented, industrious, and prosperous. There was a loom in almost every house, and with it comfort came, too. Her linens were known and appreciated all over the world, and her silks were gaining a ready market. There were in 1800, as appears by an imperfect census then taken, over 8,000 weavers employed in Cork alone, over 5,000 manufacturing woolen goods in Dublin, 3,000 making blankets in Balbrigan, 2,000 weaving calicoes in Wicklow, 1,000 making flannels, while the numbers engaged in linen work were immense. This linen trade was encouraged by subsidies, but they were gradually withdrawn until all protection ceased, in 1826. In 1825 more than thirteen million of dollars were expended in the purchase of coarse, unbleached home-made webs of linen. What a power of good, of comfort, and of happiness, those home-made webs revealed. England, not content with destroying Ireland's navigation, with crushing out, in the earlier days, her manufacture of woolens, greedy to manufacture for the world, determined that the rest of mankind should raise the raw materials to feed her hungry looms, as the South wanted us to feed their slaves, beguiled poor Ireland into assenting to the act of the union, under the terms of which every duty was repealed—some gradually, to be sure, but certainly. The act continued the tariff on woolens for twenty years, terminated it on calicoes and muslins in 1821, on cotton yarn and twist in 1816, withdrew all subsidies in 1826, and Ireland enjoyed the benefit of absolute free trade. What was the result? England held both ends of the bargain. Ireland could raise in her fertile soil the raw material. England could make it into goods cheaper than she could, but Ireland had no voice in the price to be paid for either. In 1840 another census was taken, and there were 500 blanket-makers in Kilkenny, 200 silk-weavers in Dublin, no cars pet-maker in all Ireland, no linen-weavers in Cork, 300 operatives in that city in all the manufacturing industries, where fifteen years before there were 8,000 weavers alone.

Free trade had done its work and Ireland was starving. She is the only absolutely free-trade country in the world to-day, the only land enjoying its rare privileges in complete fullness, and what a commentary it affords with a good climate, a fertile soil, great rivers, splendid water-power, broad, safe bays and harbors, an abundance of minerals, an industriously-inclined people, it is the most terribly vexed, troubled, suffering, distracted, impoverished, starving country in the world. Irishmen, loving their land earnestly and with more unbounded enthusiasm than the men of any other country, have been driven into exile by the million. Now, I do not blindly charge all of her woes to free trade alone; land tenure has to answer for a portion, not for more than half. Give her a parliament of her own, and the first act passed would be a protective tariff, and in twenty years from now the exiled Irishman would return to the land he loves and find it peaceful, contented, and prosperous. England, for her own selfish purposes, fastened these two fearful leeches upon her, and they have been fattening on her blood. England and her ally, the Democratic party, are undertaking to fasten free trade upon us, and, strange to say, nine-tenths of our citizens of Irish birth, starved out of home and driven here into exile, go every year to the polls and vote with England's Democratic ally for free trade!

IS FREE TRADE PRACTICABLE?

Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the abstruse theories or attempt to dissect the cunning sophistries of free trade, but will offer a single problem for the American workingmen of the country to solve. Can we compete with Europe, paying wages on the average not over half as high as ours, in the manufacture of cotton, wool, silk, iron, steel, and wood, when the perfected article represents from 80 to 90 per cent. of labor, without degrading our workmen and cutting down their wages? We build a mill in New England, quarry the stone and excavate the earth for its foundation, convert the forest trees into lumber, the iron ore in the earth into bolts, rods, spikes, and nails, the clay from its banks into bricks, and with laborers, masons, carpenters, slaters, painters, and glaziers, complete the structure. For this we pay—

	Per week.
Laborers	$7 00 to $9 00
Bricklayers	12 00 to 18 00
Masons	9 00 to 15 00
Gas-fitters	10 00 to 18 00
Carpenters	10 00 to 15 00
Painters	12 00 to 16 00
Plasterers	10 00 to 15 00
Plumbers	12 00 to 18 00
Slaters	10 00 to 15 00
Granite workers	12 00 to 18 00
Millwrights	12 00 to 18 00

Then we make the necessary machinery, and for the skilled workmen required we pay from $12 to $24 a week. Now, ready for operation, it has cost $300,000, 90 per cent. of which, or $270,000, represents labor. For our capital we pay from 6 to 8 per cent. interest.

To our operatives we pay about as follows:

	Per week.
Card grinders	$9 00 to $10 00
Cloth haulers	8 00 to 9 00
Drawers in	7 00 to 9 00
Peckers	9 00 to 13 50
Spinners	9 00 to 12 00
Mule-spinners	9 50 to 10 00
Weavers	7 00 to 12 00
Rollers	8 00 to 9 00
Overseers of carding	8 00 to 9 00
Spinning and weaving	14 00 to 21 00

The finished piece of cloth, ready for the market, has cost $100.

The Englishman builds the same mill, the same number of sets of cards, equipped with like machinery; makes a piece of goods the exact counterpart of ours. The wages he has paid on the structure and machinery are as follows:

	Per week.
Laborers	$5 82
Bricklayers	9 25
Masons	8 70
Gas-fitters	7 80
Carpenters	9 00
Painters	8 50
Plasterers	9 72
Plumbers	9 00
Slaters	9 72
Granite workers	8 00
Millwrights and machinists	$7 00 to 10 00

To the operatives as follows:

	Per week.
Woolsorters	$6 24 to $6 72
Scourers and dyers	4 80 to 5 75
Dyers (not foremen)	5 25 to 5 75
Teasers	4 32 to 5 25
Scribblers (foremen)	9 60 to 14 40
Fitters	4 32 to 5 75
Feeders	1 92 to 2 88
Spinners	7 70 to 9 69
Piecers	1 92 to 2 40
Weavers, men	6 00 to 8 40
Weavers, women	3 60 to 4 80
Millers	4 80 to 5 75
Millers (foremen)	9 60 to 14 40
Raisers and cutters	6 00 to 7 20
Raisers and cutters (boys)	1 92 to 2 88
Burlers	1 92 to 2 40
Pressers	5 75 to 6 72
Laborers	4 32 to 5 25

The average wages being less than two-thirds of ours. The mill, equipped, has not cost over $200,000. The annual interest for the capital 4 per cent. The cost of the piece of goods will not exceed $70. Now, if the English mill-owner can send that piece of goods into our market free of duty he can sell it for $80, $20 less than the actual cost of ours, and make a profit of $10. Can the New England mill run? Yes, but only in one way. Reduce the cost of our mill, of our machinery, and of our goods by cutting down the wages of all the men and women who have labored from the laying of the mill's foundation to the finishing of the cloth, so that our piece shall cost but $70.

This is the free-trade, Democratic way. But the workingmen of America pay the penalty in poor living, less comforts in their homes, less schools for their children. Even then would the mill probably continue to run? England manufactures an enormous surplus of woolens. She will not glut the home market and break the prices there, and can well afford to sell the surplus here at less than the cost. But, urges the free-trader, the workmen could then buy their clothing for less, and in this find ample compensation. Is this true? History flatly contradicts it, as I shall conclusively show before I am through. The Republican party, on the contrary, declares that the mill shall be erected, the machinery built, and the workmen employed without any reduction of wages. How will they accomplish this? Simply by saying to the Manchester manufacturer, "Send your goods into our markets, but first pay, for the support of our Government, $30 on every piece you send," thus making his goods equal to ours in cost. This is a protective tariff.

I have taken my example from a woolen mill in England, for the highest wages in Europe are in that country, and there the cotton and woolen hands receive the best pay. Even there the average of wages of the trades, manufacturing and agricultural laborers is only about one-half of the average here. A careful examination of the table I shall annex, furnished by the report sent to Congress recently by the honorable Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts, discloses that the wages of Belgium are less than one-half, of Denmark about one-third, of France one-third, and of Germany less than one-third of the wages paid in the United States. But, it is urged, in these countries the cost of living is greatly less than here, and the money received buys more. It is true the living of European laborers costs less, but they have less. It is not possible for them to have the generous living of Americans, for they have not the money to purchase it. The actual necessaries of life, in fact, command higher prices in all countries than in ours. The same tables show that in Belgium they cost more by 20 per cent.; France, 25 per cent.; in Germany 20 per cent., and in England considerably more.

Mr. President, the policy which has a tendency to reduce wages in this country and degrade our working men and women is a bad one for the Republic, and its sugar-coating by all the theories and sophistries of Democratic free-traders cannot make it good. In Europe the women carry bricks and mortar for the masons, work in the field with the hoe and the scythe; and a report made to the British Parliament a few years since shows that even in favored England there were forty thousand little bare-footed girls from six to ten years of age carrying wet clay on their little bare heads in the English brickyards at from four to eight cents a day. The descriptions of the condition of the laboring men and women of Europe contained in The State of Labor in Europe, published by authority of Congress in 1878, are terrible pictures of poverty, degradation, vice, and utter hopelessness.

THE EFFECT OF THE TARIFF UPON THE PRICE OF MANUFACTURES.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and all advocates of free trade, or tariff for revenue only, insist with great vehemence that our tariff enhances the cost of everything. The facts fail to justify the declaration. Allow me to give a few illustrations. In 1860 we had a tariff for revenue only, wages from 40 to 60 per cent. less than now, all kinds of business dull, no demand for goods; while in 1880 we had the "robber tariff" and an active demand.

I copy the following table from the Boston Journal, which I have verified:

Articles.	Price in 1860.	Price in 1881.
Cotton, raw, per pound	$0 11½	$0 11½
Sheeting, per yard	8½	8⅝
Jeans, per yard	13	13½
Wool, per pound	45	46
Harris goods, per yard	1 50	1 60
Salt	90	75
Pig iron, per ton	22 50	25 00
Rails, per ton	48 00	48 00
Nails, cut, per cwt	3 25	3 30

If the free-trade theory were true the present price of sheetings would be over 13 cents per yard now (the duty being from 46 to 57 per cent.) instead of the same as in 1860; Harris goods (the duty being 60 per cent.) would be selling for $2.40 instead of $1.60, which is ten cents more than in 1860; cut nails, on which the duty is 59 per cent., would be selling for $3.25 per hundredweight (price of 1860) plus the duty of $1.90, or $5.15 instead of $3.30. This comparison might be extended indefinitely, but the above is sufficient to expose the falsity of the free-trade assumption.

The small increase in cost of some of these articles is more than accounted for by the higher wages and quicker demand in 1880. Take the following from the Commercial Bulletin:

Goods.	1882.	1860.
Fitchburg cassimeres, per yard	$0 85	$0 95
Haile, Frost & Co., cashmerets	38½	46
Men's ribbed socks, per dozen pairs	4 50	8 00
Ladies' ribbed hose	3 00	4 25
Blankets, 9-4 Gonic	1 75	1 87½
Blankets, 10-4 Gonic	2 25	2 37½
Blankets, 11-4 Gonic	2 75	3 00
Blankets, 12-4 XX Rochdale	9 00	8 00
Moscow beavers, all-wool	3 00	4 00
Moscow beavers, cotton-warp	1 00	1 35
Standard sheeting, per yard	8	8.73
Standard drillings, per yard	8	8.92
Bleached shirtings, per yard	12.35	15.50
Printed calicoes, per yard	6.17	9.50
Printing cloths, per yard	4	5.44

There is not a fabric in the whole list that is not cheaper to-day in the markets than it was under the "tariff for revenue only." It is an ascertained fact that our Army to-day is clothed cheaper than any in the world, quality of the cloth considered.

Take iron used in ship-building. From 1850 to 1860 we paid for ship or tank plate 4 cents per pound; flange iron, 5 cents; angle-iron, 3¼ cents; rivets, 5 cents; average, 4½ cents. From 1870 to 1880 we paid for ship or tank plate 2½ cents per pound; for flange-iron, 4 cents; angle-iron, 2⅓ cents; rivets, 4½ cents; average, 3⅜ cents.

STEEL RAILS.

We commenced their manufacture in 1865, and since then have made four and one-half millions of tons. In 1864 we paid for English steel rails from $80 to $112 in gold per ton, delivered at English seaports; in 1877 the prices in England ranged from $72.50 to $77 a ton, while we, since 1870, as appears in the testimony before the House Committee on Ways and Means during the last Congress, have sold more than one million tons as low as $55 a ton, and in 1877 they run down to $40. Even now, with the tremendous demand, they are sold for from $60 to $65. It must be remembered that there never was so great a demand for rails as during the last twenty years. Since 1861 we have built 65,000 miles of railroad, and during the last two years more miles than during the ten from 1850 to 1860, under the low tariff.

The tariff stimulates production and cheapens price. Let me illustrate this with a few examples. Take the manufacture of pottery. In 1860 there were about two thousand men engaged in making pottery. The industry was struggling for an existence. In 1870 there were over six thousand; in 1880, probably twelve thousand; in 1860 the capital invested was about one million and a quarter; in 1870, five millions and a quarter; in 1880, probably double that amount. The census of 1880 has not been so completed as to enable me to be exact.

To-day there are pottery establishments in every State in this Union except Florida. Let it be remembered that in this industry the manufactured article represents more than 90 per cent. of labor; that the wages in Europe are considerably less than one-half of those paid here. Return to free trade, and no pottery manufactory could run for six months. What has been the result as to prices? Pottery sells to-day in the United States for 30 per cent. less than it did in 1860.

Take worsted goods, the creation entirely of our protective tariff, and silk goods also. Read these instructive tables taken from the census. See the wonderful growth of both industries, the number employed, the annual wages paid of $15,000,000, and then tell me, is protection destroying the country?

Year.	Number of establishments.	Number of laborers.	Capital invested.	Wages paid.
Silk manufactures:
1860	139	4,535	$2,926,980	$1,050,224
1870	86	6,649	6,231,130	1,942,286
1880	290	34,440	15,394,700	9,107,835
Worsted goods:
1860	3	2,378	3,230,000	543,684
1870	102	12,920	10,085,778	4,368,857
1880	75	18,773	20,411,043	5,645,681

And yet both silks and worsteds are selling for considerably less now than under the "tariff for revenue only."

Mr. Wyckoff, secretary of the Silk Association of America, under date of January 16, 1882, writes:

In general terms it may be stated that silk goods are fully 25 per cent., and probably 33⅓ per cent., lower than when their manufacture was begun in this country. This estimate is made on dress goods and ribbons. There are branches of manufacture in which the decline of values has been much greater. In general the decline is most marked where the goods made in this country have most successfully distanced or supplanted their foreign rivals; where the home competition has been continued long enough to reduce prices to the lowest point. As an instance of this, the manufacture of sewing silk and machine twist may be cited. This branch of trade is entirely free from foreign rivalry; its prices have been reduced by severe home competition to 50 per cent. below those of fifteen or twenty years ago, if we compare goods of equal quality. But the qualities of these, as well as of nearly all other silk goods, have immensely improved; and this fact, though gratifying, renders comparisons difficult.

How is it, Mr. President, that the tariff, seemingly a tax upon manufactures, cheapens instead of enhances the price? Ireland could answer that understandingly. She learned by bitter experience how much the price of raw material was reduced when obliged to sell it to England, and how much the value of goods made from it was enhanced when forced to buy it back manufactured, the factor of competition expelled. Worsted goods illustrate. Twenty-five years ago we made none in this country and the prices were extravagantly high. In 1862, encouraged by the high tariff, we started a dozen establishments. In 1880 they had grown to seventy-five, with a capital of more than twenty millions of dollars. They were rival establishments, competing with each other for the markets, each striving to reduce the cost without cutting down the wages. So they appealed to the inventive genius of the country, levied contributions upon that, and it responded wonderfully with machinery marvelous in its ingenuity, power, and capacity. And so, year by year, the cost of the cloths was reduced, not only here but abroad. And such has been the history of the result in every industrial enterprise started here. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] talks about the monopolies of New England. Why, sir, there is not a monopoly in New England; not one. There is not a business carried on there which is not open and free to any man. The only monopoly I know of in this country is a great railroad without any competing line.

HOW DOES THE TARIFF AFFECT FARMERS?

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] insists that the manufacturing interests have been promoted at the expense of agriculture; that our farmers have been taxed, ay, robbed, for their benefit. A serious charge; but is it true? What are the facts? The manufacturing industries have prospered and increased amazingly during the last twenty years, but the progress in agriculture has been marvelous, far outstripping them all. The census is yet incomplete, but the following is gathered from it:

The following are the wheat, corn, and oat crops in bushels during the following years:

Year.	Wheat.	Corn.	Oats.
1839	84,823,272	377,531,875	123,071,341
1849	100,485,444	592,071,104	146,584,179
1859	173,104,924	838,792,742	172,643,185
1869	287,740,626	760,944,549	282,107,157
1879	459,479,505	1,754,861,535	407,858,999

The growth of the grain-producing industry is made even more emphatic by the following statistics, which give the total productions of bread-grains during entire decades, the first embracing the ten years closing with 1850:

Decade.	Total cereal production.	Per cent. increase from 1850.	Bushels per capita.
1850	867,453,067	.....	37.4
1860	1,239,039,947	42.8	39.4
1870	1,387,299,153	59.9	35.97
1880	2,697,962,456	211.10	53.79

It will be seen that the greatest increase of the production of cereals has occurred during the last ten years—a period during which the advocates of free trade assert the agricultural interests have been sacrificed to the tariff monopolists in the manufacturing States. This may be true, but the statistics above given go far to cast suspicion upon the correctness of the free-trade statement. If manufacturing or any other industry was yielding greater profits than agriculture can afford, we would naturally infer that the rate of production would not have been doubled during a period that the agricultural classes have been robbed in the interest of the manufacturers, as the free-trader asserts. We fear that the facts are against the free-trader in this matter. It may be added, however, that the American free-trader ignores home-made facts and statistics.

Barley increased from 4,000,000 bushels in 1839 to 40,000,000 in 1879. Twenty years ago there were in the country 23,000,000 of sheep; in 1880, 42,000,000. Then the clip of wool was 60,000,000; last year, 230,000,000.

Nor, Mr. President, is the farmer left without protection. The duty on animals is 20 per cent.; bacon, 2 cents a pound; beef, 1 cent; buckwheat, 20 per cent.; butter, 4 cents a pound; cheese, 4 cents; corn, 10 per cent.; hay, 20 per cent.; oats, ten cents a bushel; pease, from 10 to 20 per cent.; potatoes, 15 cents a bushel; rye, 15 cents a bushel; sheep, 20 per cent.; wheat, 20 cents a bushel, &c.

Besides, Mr. President, are the five millions of workers in iron, copper, of cotton and wool, with five millions more dependent upon them, all consuming and producing nothing the farmers raise, no protection to them? Adopt free trade, destroy manufacturing, make these men producers instead of consumers, and would not our farmers harvest ruin from the change? A sensible farmer of Maine writing to an agricultural paper, says:

We can now get good prices for all we raise; we can buy at low or lower than before the war. A mowing-machine then cost $125 to $150. It now costs from $60 to $65. Poorly made horse-rakes, with wire teeth, $40; now finely finished and steel teeth, for $25 to $30. A small plow then sold for $5 or $6; now from $3 to $4. Most of the implements we need can be bought low. We get from 25 to 28 cents for our eggs and butter; $14 to $17 for our hay; $2 to $3 for our apples. Clothing, boots, musical instruments—in fact almost all articles can be bought much lower than twenty years ago, when we did not get so much for our productions. If monopolies are the cause of this we are benefited by them. Men of capital employ men, the men employed consume our productions. Are our customers to turn the capitalist's money over to us? Is not much of the talk about these great monopolies put forth by men and used by them as a horse on which to ride into or keep in power? Are not the times good? Cannot prudent workingmen enjoy many luxuries and lay up a little money?

It seems to me that in my own State we have a wonderful illustration of the benefits of protection. Aroostook County, situated in our extreme northeast, with only one railroad outlet, and that through the Canadian provinces, with fertile lands but long winters, its only business agriculture and lumbering, inclosed on two sides by the Dominion of Canada, where everything from the farm can be raised cheaper than in the States, shows by the last census how agriculture has been "robbed" by protection and farmers sacrificed to manufacturers. The percentage of the growth of population from 1860 to 1880 is 85 per cent., the percentage from 1870 to 1880 being 41 per cent. A comparison of the agricultural products of that county, as returned in the two censuses of 1870 and 1880, being the crops of the years 1869 and 1879, shows the following percentage of increase:

	Per cent.
Tons of hay	60
Irish potatoes	490
Value of orchard products	17
Pounds of wool	121
Dairy products* (milk, butter, cheese)	83
Cereals:
Bushels of barley	223
Bushels of buckwheat	82
Bushels of Indian corn	9
Bushels of oats	18
Bushels of rye	327
Bushels of wheat	194

A comparison of the statistics of live stock on farms as returned in the two censuses of the years 1870 and 1880, shows the following percentage of increase:

	Per cent.
Horses	79
Mules and asses	10
Milch-cows	73
Other cattle	68
Swine	65
Sheep	175
Working oxen	34

*All the products of the dairy in the above computation were reduced to butter, on the basis of 3 gallons of milk, or 2½ pounds of cheese to one pound of butter.

It produces millions of bushels of potatoes, the best in the world, but ordinarily, if forwarded to the markets, the long distances on bad roads running through a foreign country, they would hardly be worth the raising. Here the tariff, that "robber," comes to their relief, by laying a duty of 20 per cent. on potato starch, starting up starch-factories over the county, accessible to all, and easily taking their surplus crop at fair prices. So the county during the last ten years has been steadily growing in prosperity, her farmers getting out of debt, making improvements, clearing up new lands, building great barns and comfortable houses, supplying for their families not only the necessaries of life, but indulging them in its luxuries. I had the pleasure of traveling through it last season, and found it in all things a marvelous creation, as I believe, of a protective tariff.

Mr. President, we grow rich and powerful under protection, and yet we have free trade more absolute and abundant than all the rest of the world between thirty-eight States and nine Territories, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, from the Dominion of Canada to the Gulf of Mexico. That internal trade last year amounted to eighteen billions of dollars, six times greater than the export and import trade of Great Britain. I have used some figures from an article in the last International Review, entitled Influence of European Industries on the United States, by J. L. Stevens. Mr. Stevens is our minister resident at Stockholm; has been in Europe for many years, is a man of ability, experience, and extended information.

I commend the article as one replete with valuable information, and take the liberty of quoting his opinion, gathered from long and careful observation:

> It was the imperative need of the United States for revenue, and the requirements of our national resources and of our internal trade, which caused our statesmen at a great national epoch to adopt our present tariff policy. Fortunate it was that our imperative revenue needs to sustain national existence and national faith conformed so completely to the internal wants of the country's resources in respect of development. By it our national unity was maintained against titanic assaults within and great perils abroad. By it our national honor has been kept untarnished, and now shines with "purest ray serene" in the financial markets of the world. The solid fact—the ripe fruits from the vigorous tree of experience—gives irresistible testimony in its favor. In less than twenty years the entire property of the country has increased from $16,000,000,000 to nearly $38,000,000,000, though in that time $4,500,000,000 were lost to the country's wealth by the war. The manufacturing power and products of the country have nearly tripled, the United States at this time turning out cotton and woolen fabrics more than one-fifth as much as entire Europe, while possessing less than one-sixth as much population. Our entire manufactures of all kinds are equal to one-fourth of the total produced by Europe. In the same period we have built more than sixty thousand miles of railroad, and since 1865 have paid off $800,000,000 of national debt, and reduced our annual interest on the same to the extent of $70,000,000. In the same time, of less than nineteen years, our home commerce has augmented threefold, our foreign trade has largely increased, and our financial power and prestige in the commercial centers of the world stand far higher than they stood twenty years since.

Mr. President, how wonderfully applicable to our country now after twenty years of protection is that beautiful picture drawn by Mr. Clay after the seven years of the tariff bearing his name. The only figures we miss are "the overflowing Treasury" and "our tonnage swelled and fully occupied." The deficiency from the picture of "the overflowing Treasury" I shall not attempt to account for, lest I might be accused with trying to rake open the dying embers of internecine strife; but the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] compels me to consider briefly the "tonnage swelled and fully occupied," for he declares with emphasis that the war had nothing to do with the destruction of our commerce, that protection is answerable for it—a most amazing assertion in the light of history!

From 1850 to 1860, England having found that she could not compete with us in building wooden ships, that she was handicapped with want of material, was compelled to freight it thousands of miles, that we were not only outstripping her in the race but were selling her hundreds of thousands of tons of shipping every year, tried the experiment of iron steamships, found them a success, changed from side-wheelers to propellers, from the ordinary high-pressure engine to the compound, increasing the speed and saving nearly one-half of the coal. Proudly indifferent from our success, we made no such experiments, traveling in the old pathway until we found ourselves in the midst of a fearful war.

In July, 1861, the Sumter destroyed the ship Golden Rocket. At this time our ships were in every sea, in all the ports of the world, freighted with the productions of every country, bearing the fortunes of thousands of our citizens. The intense alarm of our merchants and ship-owners can at this late day hardly be realized. Whither could our scattered ships flee for protection? The wing of the Government was powerless to cover them. English ship-yards became busy, and the Florida, the Alabama, the Georgia, the Tallahassee, the Chickamauga, and the Shenandoah, built in these yards, equipped, provisioned, and manned in English ports, were soon preying upon American commerce.

The destruction of our shipping was immediate and the effect upon our commerce terrible. For years we had been increasing our ocean tonnage immensely—from 1830 to 1840, 60 per cent.; from 1840 to 1850, 75 per cent.; from 1850 to 1860, 60 per cent., and in 1861 had reached our highest point, having afloat 2,700,000 tons, and occupying the second place among the nations of the earth in the extent of ocean tonnage. A few years more of such advance would have given us the proud position of mistress of the seas. England saw this, feared it, and these cruisers were only doing her will. From 1861 to 1866 more than a million tons of this shipping was lost to us; more than one hundred thousand were burned by English cruisers, sailing under the confederate flag, and more than nine hundred thousand sought protection under foreign flags, principally under that of England. The value of that remaining was crippled by the perils of the cruisers, the risk of sailing under our flag being so great as to drive a large proportion of the carrying trade into foreign bottoms. Our prestige was gone, our commercial power broken, and England was without a rival. Who can estimate the gain to her acquired by her wrong to us, a wrong she subsequently admitted and partly atoned? During the war, with all our energies directed to the saving of the nation, we saw her take nearly all of our carrying trade, and were utterly powerless. For two or three years after we were examining our accounts, balancing our books, restoring the Union, providing for a debt so enormous as almost to daze the people, and she still held her advantage. Without any of the advantages we had in 1850, with the disadvantages of heavier taxation of ships, of a tonnage improperly measured and taxed, of municipal assessments upon the vessel's value, while England assesses only on net earnings, with heavier port charges than she pays in foreign ports, with higher wages of officers and seamen, still there was a door we might have opened for the recovery of our carrying trade, and we never opened it. For the last ten years we could build iron steamships as good and almost as cheaply as she; but to do this, and to establish lines to compete with those already established, required immense capital, and the necessary capital needed encouragement. If we had paid our steamships for carrying our mails to foreign countries as much in proportion as we paid the steamboats for carrying them on the Mississippi River, or the stages for the same service across the prairies, we to-day should have been far advanced on the highway of recovery. If we had followed the examples of England, France, Germany, and, indeed, of any of the European powers, our iron steamships would to-day be plowing their seas. But we have been frightened out of our usual wits by the cry of "Wolf!" We lost our carrying trade by the war, and have not taken the first step since the war closed to recover it. Now, pray, what had the protective tariff to do with it? How could it affect it other than by reducing our exports and imports? But it has not reduced them. They have been surely and steadily increasing from $687,192,254 in 1860, until last year they reached the enormous sum of $1,613,770,633.

No, Mr. Senator, not protection, but war did the mischief; folly and cowardice have prevented all reparation. In the earlier days of the Republic, when England undertook to weaken our growing power on the seas, to defend it we declared war, expended $150,000,000 and thousands of precious lives; in the latter, when the same England, taking advantage of our distracted country, wickedly and selfishly succeeded in accomplishing what she ignobly failed in before, we allowed her to triumph, lest the representatives of the people should, forsooth, be taunted with voting for subsidies.

But, sir, a discussion of the question of the restoration of our "swelled tonnage" of the past is hardly legitimate to the measure now under consideration, and I refrain, simply asserting that Senator BECK's method of restoration is utterly delusive; that free trade in ships, the repeal of our navigation laws, could not possibly have any result other than the immediate closing of every ship-yard in the country, the entering into other trades of all of our skilled workmen, the placing of our country at the mercy of England in event of war, and the complete surrender of our coastwise trade.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to show that the doctrine of free trade sprung from a selfish and unworthy purpose; that while marvelous changes have been wrought in our country, slavery abolished, labor elevated, industries developed and multiplied, the Democratic party still adheres to the dangerous heresy; that free trade is antagonistic to our institutions and to our civilization; that its adoption would necessarily degrade our workmen, reduce their wages, and have a tendency to unfit them for American citizenship; that protection has invariably brought us prosperity, increased wages, decreased cost of manufactures, and furnished a ready market for our farmers; that the best interests of all our people will be secured by a continuance of this the Republican policy. But, sir, I recognize as an important factor in this that our tariff laws must be harmonious, just, and equitable, and that the existing law does not in all respects answer this demand. Since the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] gave it to the country, so-called amendments have been made to it from time to time, some healthy, some unhealthy. The condition of business, the requirements of trade, the necessities of the people have changed; the rulings of the Treasury Department have modified its terms; there are excrescences that ought to be removed, rates too high that should be reduced, and in some instances too low, requiring raising; some articles now free should be taxed, and many now taxed should be made free. What is the best method of procedure? I have taken part in the House of Representatives in two revisions of the tariff, and in the Committee of Ways and Means in one attempted. This experience determines me in favor of the pending bill providing for a commission.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its indulgence.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS ACT.

Mr. INGALLS. The regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HALE in the chair.) The Senator from Kansas demands the regular order, which is the resolution relating to the arrears of pensions act.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow a vote to be had upon the pending proposition of the Senator from Kansas. I desire to have that subject disposed of and out of the way, if possible, to-day.

Mr. PENDLETON. I think a vote can hardly be reached to-day.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no desire to debate the proposition further myself. Unless some Senator desires to speak to the resolution or some of the amendments, I should venture to express the wish that the matter might be disposed of to-day.

Mr. CALL. There is an amendment to the resolution on which I desire to submit a few remarks to the Senate. I am indifferent whether I do so now or when the Senate meets again.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think it is very apparent that we shall not be able to reach a vote on the resolution to-day. There is executive business to be transacted, and I think we had better go at once into executive session. There is no legislation in the pending resolution; it is nothing but a mere declaration of opinion on the part of the Senate. There is nothing to be effected by it, and it will not hurt for it to go over, and we ought to attend to the executive business that is before us.

Mr. VANCE. I have the permission of the Senator from Ohio, who has moved to go into executive session, to make a statement.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make an inquiry. I have an impression that there was some unanimous agreement announced by the Chair in regard to taking a vote on the resolution on a certain day. Was it not to-day?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, it was yesterday.

Mr. VANCE. I simply desire to say that there are several of us on this side of the Chamber, myself among the number, who desire to submit some remarks to the Senate upon the bill of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to create a commission to revise the tariff. I have declined to ask the indulgence of the Senate to interfere with its regular proceedings for so long a time that if the vote cannot be taken this evening upon the pending resolution I wish to give notice that on Monday I shall adopt the course which others have adopted, and ask the Senate to lay aside the resolution of the Senator from Kansas for the purpose of allowing me to make some remarks on the bill of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ALLISON. Day before yesterday there was unanimous consent that a vote should be taken on the resolution of the Senator from Kansas yesterday. Of course the memorial services that intervened yesterday prevented that understanding from being carried out, and that was a very proper thing; but it seems to me that the understanding had day before yesterday justifies us in taking a vote some time to-day, or at least before adjournment.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Iowa permit me to make a statement?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps it is proper that I should state at this juncture what I have never stated before, and that is, that I accept the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to my amendment with the understanding that he will strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or," so that it will read "needy or disabled."

Mr. INGALLS. I never inserted the word "and." The original amendment was wrongly printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is wrongly printed. It should be "or."

Mr. BUTLER. I was advised of that fact, but I wanted it understood. I have seen the original amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, and the word "or" appears there. I desired to have that understood, so that there may be no misunderstanding about it, and hence I called attention to it. I therefore think it proper at this juncture to give notice that I accept the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as far as I can do so. That statement being made, it may perhaps shorten the discussion somewhat.

Mr. INGALLS. The understanding was reached day before yesterday by unanimous consent, and clearly accepted by all, as appears by the report of the debate in the RECORD, that a vote on the pending resolution should be had yesterday. The debate had nearly concluded when the legislative session of the Senate was interrupted by the arrival of the hour for pronouncing the eulogies upon a colleague in the House of Representatives of the Senator from South Carolina. In view of that fact, and in consideration of the further fact that important measures are pending, it appears to me that the Senate would do well to reach a vote on this resolution to-day. I ask the Senator from Ohio if he is not willing, in view of the facts as they appear, to allow the business to proceed, so that we may dispose of this matter and not let it go over until Monday? If it goes over until Monday another debate may occur. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] has given notice that he desires to lay aside the pending business for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon the bill of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. And I desire to say that whenever the tariff bill is taken up again I wish to have the Senate continue that order of business until the measure is disposed of.

Mr. INGALLS. I am quite sure there can be no considerable debate further upon this resolution, and it is one of sufficient importance, I think, to justify me in asking action upon it.

Mr. BUTLER. So far as it is necessary to do so, I concur entirely with the views expressed by the Senator from Kansas. It is only half past three o'clock now, and I think it very likely that we could reach a vote upon the resolution this evening. As far as I am concerned, I am extremely desirous that that should be done, and I see nothing to prevent our reaching a vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withdraw the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, and that the Senator from Kansas will insist, as he certainly has a right to do, in view of the understanding that was reached by unanimous consent two or three days ago, upon having a vote before the Senate adjourns to-day. I think it important to the business of the Senate that we should come to a vote upon the resolution, in order that other measures of importance may be taken up in their regular order and considered. I hope, however early or late it may be, that the Senate will dispose of this question this evening.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have certainly no disposition to do anything which would seem to be in violation of the understanding the other day that the Senate should come to a vote on the resolution yesterday. But yesterday the debate went on until quite a late hour, and it was unfinished when the Senate adjourned. I understand that there are gentlemen now ready to take the floor upon the resolution, and that it will not be possible, probably, to reach a vote to night. If nobody desires to speak, I have no disposition to cut off an immediate vote upon the resolution; but I understand the Senator from Florida and others are prepared to go on with the discussion, and I do not think it can be finished to night. Therefore I insist upon my motion to go into executive session, without desiring in the least unduly to interfere with the convenience of the Senator from Kansas or any understanding that the Senate may have reached the other day.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall be influenced somewhat in my action by the wishes of the Senator from Florida. If he prefers to proceed with his remarks this evening——

Mr. CALL. I am entirely willing to submit the question to the Senate. I shall not occupy a very great while, and I am willing to submit to whatever may be the pleasure of the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I think it is too late an hour now to proceed with the discussion of this matter. No gentleman should be asked to take the floor upon a question of this kind at so late an hour in the day. It is nearly four o'clock, our usual adjourning time, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PENDLETON. Why not let us have an executive session?

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senate is ready to vote on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to go into executive session I shall not interfere with that motion, but will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 10, 1882.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ASSISTANT CLERK FOR APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ATKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ an additional assistant clerk, at an annual compensation of $1,200.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask consent that the resolution be considered and adopted at this time.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DARRELL. I ask consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. TAYLOR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DARRELL. As I am going away from the city and will not be here on Monday, I ask consent to introduce a bill at this time.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will withdraw the call for that purpose.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MORGAN CITY, LOUISIANA.

Mr. DARRELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4215) to provide for the construction of a public building at Morgan City, State of Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HEWITT, of New York, until Tuesday next.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAYLOR. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour, for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. PRESCOTT. In view of the fact that the apportionment bill is now pending before the House, although there are sixty or seventy bills on the Private Calendar, with the idea of taking the sense of the House, I move that the morning hour and the Private Calendar as such be dispensed with and that the House now proceed to the consideration of the apportionment bill.

Mr. RANDALL. You cannot dispense with both on one motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRESCOTT] to dispense with the morning hour.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. It requires a two-thirds vote to agree to that motion.

The motion was not agreed to upon a division—ayes 88, noes 62; two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports of a private character, this being Friday.

JAMES REA.

Mr. HUMPHREY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 93) to authorize the Secretary of State to allow for expenditures within named to James Rea, late consul at Belfast, Ireland, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the same be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

RECKNAGEL & CO.

Mr. REED, from the committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2203) for the relief of Recknagel & Co., and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS G. MACKEY AND OTHERS.

Mr. REED also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3309) for the relief of Thomas G. Mackey and the heirs-at-law of William A. Hyde, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the same be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

NEWTOWN NATIONAL BANK, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 701) making appropriations for the relief of the First National Bank of Newtown, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INTEREST ON JUDGMENT IN COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I am also directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill to amend section 1090 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to interest on judgment in the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. That is a public bill.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. It is a public bill, but is connected with the same matter as the one I have just reported.

The SPEAKER. Under the practice of the House only bills of a private character can be reported on this call on Friday.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Then I will retain the bill.

WALL STREET NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. FLOWER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3870) to change the name of the National Mechanics' Banking Association of New York to Wall Street National Bank.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CRAPO. Should not that bill go to the House Calendar?

The SPEAKER. If it belongs to the House Calendar, then it must be a public bill and not in order under this call. As it relates to a private corporation, the Chair is inclined to think that it should go to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CRAPO. The principal consideration is early action on the bill. Sending it to the Private Calendar is postponing the time for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it must be referred to the Private Calendar if reported under this call.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

THOMAS SAMPSON.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3025) for the relief of Thomas Sampson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVERS IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. GUENTHER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House—

First. Whether the dam maintained as a part of the Government works on the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement at Menasha, Wisconsin, was not one of the principal agencies in producing the high stage of water in Lake Winnebago during the fall of 1881, whereby great damage was done business, property, and interests in the cities of Fond du Lac and Oshkosh, situate upon its borders, by overflow of waters from the basin of the lake.

Second. Whether the continuance of said dam at its present height is essential to the improvement of Fox River, when considered independently of any question of water-power interests belonging exclusively to private parties.

Third. Whether the said dam may not be lowered so as to permit the waters of the lake to discharge in such volume as to prevent a recurrence of the back-water floods of 1881, without impairing the efficiency of the improvement and without causing any radical change in the present adopted plans for the work. And, if it may be so lowered, then that the said Secretary shall report to this House to what extent it may be so lowered, together with plans and specifications for the work, and an estimate of the cost thereof.

Mr. GUENTHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM SCHUCHARDT.

Mr. LORD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4216) for the relief of William Schuchardt, United States commercial agent at Piedras Negras, Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to present a privileged report at this time?

The SPEAKER. It has been the practice to treat privileged reports—reports bringing back resolutions of inquiry—as in order under this call. But the Chair has uniformly stated that it was not regarded as the best practice to bring in during the morning hour a resolution of that character, which might sometimes give rise to debate and occupy the whole hour. Such reports are in order at any other time as well as now. A report of that character will be entertained, if the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to submit it.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I will accept the suggestion of the Chair, and withhold the report for the present.

GENERAL ALVORD.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 1113) for the relief of General Alvord; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRAGG. By direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I have leave to file the views of the minority on that bill, and ask that they may be printed with the majority report.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the request of the gentleman will be granted.

There was no objection.

BURTON ARMSTRONG.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 2559) granting an increase of pension to Burton Armstrong; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ROSETTA L. M'KAY.

Mr. DAWES, from the same committee, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to Mrs. Rosetta L. McKay; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

STAFFORD PALMER.

Mr. DAWES also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1263) granting a pension to Stafford Palmer; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELIJAH W. PENNY.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 2005) to increase the pension of Elijah W. Penny; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HENRY BINNAMON.

Mr. MATSON, also from the same committee, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 243) to increase the pension of Henry Binnamon; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. H. ANDERSON.

Mr. MATSON, from the same committee, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 3248) granting a pension to William H. H. Anderson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT JOHN DIXON.

Mr. BROWNE. I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to ask that they be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3708) for the relief of Lieutenant John Dixon, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It simply appropriates four hundred and ninety odd dollars, and that is all there is in it.

The SPEAKER. It makes an appropriation for what purpose?

Mr. BROWNE. For the pay of a lieutenant of the Army during the war of the rebellion.

The SPEAKER. Then it is in the nature of a claim, and ought to go to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. BROWNE. Perhaps it should. I so modify my motion.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Committee on Invalid Pensions will be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

REBECCA REYNOLDS.

Mr. JOYCE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1397, a bill (H. R. No. 4217) granting an increase of pension to Rebecca Reynolds; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY P. THOMPSON.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1519) granting a pension to Mary P. Thompson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH H. CROW.

Mr. CULLEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 212) granting a pension to Joseph H. Crow; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH BERTRAM.

Mr. CULLEN also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 2754) granting a pension to Elizabeth Bertram; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PERRY A. LEATHERBERRY.

Mr. MASON, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3134) for the relief of Perry A. Leatherberry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SALMON B. COLBY.

On motion of Mr. MASON, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1055) for the relief of Salmon B. Colby; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

WILLIAM F. MARTIN.

Mr. OATES, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2151) to pay William F. Martin, of Mobile, Alabama, the value of one hundred half boxes of tobacco, illegally seized and sold by the collector of internal revenue at New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROBERT L. M'CONNAUGHEY.

Mr. OATES also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4218) for the relief of Robert L. McConnaughey; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH R. SHANNON.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 549) for the relief of Joseph R. Shannon; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

HARDIE R. BROWN.

Mr. HOUK, from the Committee on War Claims, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1601, a bill (H. R. No. 4219) for the relief of Hardie R. Brown; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM T. SEWARD.

Mr. HOUK also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bills Nos. 2291 and 2771, a bill (H. R. No. 4220) for the relief of William T. Seward; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NAPOLEON B. GIDDINGS.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 938) for the relief of Napoleon B. Giddings; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

NICHOLAS BUSH.

Mr. HALL also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Nicholas Bush for relief; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LA GRANGE SYNODICAL COLLEGE.

Mr. HALL also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of the trustees of the La Grange Synodical College; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

R. W. WINBOURN.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the petition of R. W. Winbourn; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. DUNNELL. The call of committees I believe has been concluded.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees has been completed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, 13 only voting in the affirmative.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over till Monday next; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the latter motion is agreed to.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have a communication from Hon. A. G. Porter, governor of Indiana, relative to internal improvements, together with a copy of a letter from Lieutenant J. A. Smith, United States Engineers, and a statistical table, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is ordered accordingly.

The papers are as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Indianapolis, Indiana, February 3, 1882.

DEAR SIR: It has long been apparent that the work of river and harbor improvement in the State of Indiana has not received the consideration to which their absolute or relative importance would entitle them.

The harbor works at Michigan City have been the means of creating and fostering an extensive commerce, not only of local, but of great general importance. It is entirely due to these works that in the past four years the business and population have increased more than threefold. At present the only limit to further growth seems to be the harbor room which can be furnished. It is believed that but few places can show as great a return for money expended.

The small appropriations hitherto have left the harbor incomplete, and therefore insecure, so that the full benefits have not been realized; meanwhile this incompleteness has resulted in the wreck of several vessels.

The work is now in such condition as to render a large appropriation of unusual importance, and it cannot be too strongly urged upon the attention of those who represent the interests of this State in Congress.

Much the same may be said of the improvements on the Wabash and White Rivers; their valleys are among the richest agricultural sections of this country.

A large traffic is springing up on these waters, mainly due to improvements made in the last three or four years. Statistics and letters in this office show conclusively that in the last year alone the net benefit to business and farming interests was more than the total expenditures in four years.

The improvements on the Wabash River have been confined to that portion between Indiana and Illinois, so that both States have shared the benefits.

I hand you herewith a tabulated statement giving certain figures on this subject to show that in the distribution of these benefits Indiana, while contributing more than most States to the material and commercial interests of the country, has actually and relatively been placed at the bottom of the list.

I have had the table compiled from reliable sources, and while it is not beyond revision or modification, it will be found essentially correct, and it is a fair sample of what has obtained in previous years.

The only States which show a less relative amount than Indiana would be otherwise indicated were the appropriations for the Mississippi and its two largest tributaries locally distributed.

In addition to figures in this table surveys were ordered in most of the States, in some of them several, looking to the extension of such works of improvement, while in Indiana there were none.

I have thus asked your attention to this matter, believing it worthy the attention of our delegation, and I shall gladly furnish a copy to any of them who may desire it.

Yours, very truly,

A. G. PORTER.

Hon. WILLIAM H. CALKINS, M. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I inclose to you a tabulated statement prepared by Major Jared A. Smith, United States Army, showing the river and harbor appropriations made by Congress and the relative amounts received by each of the States.

It will be perceived that the amounts appropriated for the benefit of Indiana have been singularly small in proportion to those received by most of the States. The table will, I believe, be of use to you when the river and harbor bill shall be under consideration.

I have the pleasure of inclosing to you a letter addressed to me by Major Smith at the time he transmitted his tabulated statement. As the letter is a rather lengthy one I have sent a copy of it to you, Mr. Peelle, and General Harrison. You can show it to the other members.

You will find it worthy of serious consideration.

Very respectfully,

JARED A. SMITH,
Major of Engineers, United States Army.

Hon. A. G. PORTER, Governor of Indiana.

Appropriations for improving waters forming the boundary between States have been divided between such States as nearly as possible in proportion to the boundaries so formed. The appropriations for the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers, owing to their length and general importance, are not apportioned to the adjacent States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VALENTINE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the demand is too late.

Mr. VALENTINE. I made the demand at the proper time. I stood here in my place demanding it, and endeavored to get the attention of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman as rising for that purpose.

Mr. VALENTINE. That is not my fault. If there is too much confusion here for a member to be heard he ought not to be held responsible for it. I ought to have reached the Speaker and was endeavoring to do so.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist upon the demand?

Mr. VALENTINE. I do insist upon it, and have been insisting upon it.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. There is so much confusion in the hall that it is utterly impossible to understand what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. The House must be in order, and public business will be suspended until gentlemen resume their seats.

Mr. VALENTINE. The motion was put by the Speaker, and declared to be carried, before the House knew anything about it. Nor has there been any announcement made by the Speaker that this was ordered by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman is mistaken, and that the announcement was duly made to the House.

Mr. VALENTINE. The announcement was certainly not understood by the House. I should have objected to it myself, and I think that other gentlemen around me did object to it.

Mr. CAMP. When the Speaker stated that without objection the motion to reconsider would be laid upon the table I did object at the time, but in the confusion I am not sure that the objection was heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion if a gentleman states that he demanded a vote upon this or any other proposition, and on account of the confusion in the House his demand was not recognized by the Chair, that he should not be cut off from his right to demand a vote.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish to inquire if a member rises in this House and appeals to the Speaker, and the Speaker does not hear him, does not recognize his motion, does he have any right? Does not his right depend upon the recognition of the Speaker, and if under the circumstances he is not heard, and his motion, whatever it may be, is not entertained, can he thereafter claim as a matter of privilege that if he had obtained the eye of the Speaker he would have done so and so?

Mr. VALENTINE. But I did so at the time; I demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBESON. The question I raise is one of absolute fact, whether, under the circumstances, a gentleman claiming to have made such a demand, and not being recognized for the purpose, has any right in the premises.

Mr. DUNNELL. If I am allowed to do so, I will withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in response to the gentleman from New Jersey, that it is clearly of opinion if, owing to the confusion in the House, any gentleman was unable to make a demand of the Chair which he was entitled under the rules and practice of the House to make, that he should not be cut off from that privilege. The only question, however, in this connection is how long after that demand a gentleman may remain in his seat and not press his claim to recognition where he has demanded to be recognized.

Mr. HAWK. That is clearly the point.

The SPEAKER. But under the circumstances, if the gentleman from Nebraska insists upon his motion, the Chair will submit the question to the House as to whether it will order the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BOWMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOWMAN. Inasmuch, Mr. Speaker, as this question may become a precedent, it ought to be settled with a view to the future practice of the House. I therefore raise this parliamentary inquiry, whether when a gentleman claiming recognition has not been recognized by the Chair to make his motion, and intervening business interposes such as in this case, or several subjects of intervening business come between—whether he can then be recognized on a statement of the fact that he attempted to obtain the recognition of the Chair; and if so, after how long a time can he make such a claim—a half hour, three hours, or the next day? What is the limit of the intervening business that may come in and cut him off from that right?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there can be no difficulty about the question submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. But the question now before us is a different one. In declaring the result of the vote, and under the form of practice of the House, it is the right of any member to demand the ayes and noes or a division of the House. It is not therefore a question of recognition, but it is a question of absolute right for a member to make that demand, and he is bound under the practice to have recognition for that purpose.

Mr. BOWMAN. If the Chair will permit me I will suggest, however, that if I remember right, a petition was introduced and leave was given to put in the record or it was referred to a committee, or some such proceeding took place. There was therefore intervening business transacted independently of the former motions, and the question is, where does the right to make a demand to be recognized for such purpose stop if a member may come in and say, "I could not obtain the recognition of the Chair, I could not catch the Speaker's eye, and therefore now, after intervening business of five minutes, or a half hour, or three hours, because I could not catch the Speaker's eye, I want to come in and press the motion."

The SPEAKER. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Chair would say it is of opinion that the gentleman making such a demand must not abandon it, or if he does he loses the right to make it.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order.

Mr. VALENTINE. I wish to say that the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWMAN] is not involved in this.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Nebraska insisted on his demand?

Mr. VALENTINE. I have, and have done so all the time.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CAMP. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska demands the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed when it adjourns to-day to adjourn over until Monday.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 22, not a sufficient number.

Mr. VALENTINE. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering tellers there were ayes 15, not one-fifth of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. Tellers on the yeas and nays are refused. The yeas and nays are refused, and the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider is agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to say one word.

Mr. BOWMAN. Is the motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire simply to say——

Mr. BOWMAN. If debate is allowed we want debate on this side also.

Mr. CASWELL. I merely wish to say the Committee on Appropriations are ready to proceed with the post-office bill.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR.]

The SPEAKER. Amendments to that motion are not in order.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 90, noes 22.

So (further count not being called for) the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Pending the announcement of the vote the Chair will lay before the House a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1024) for the relief of Sidney P. Luther; and

An act (H. R. No. 1670) for the relief of E. J. Gurley.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The result of the vote was then announced and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider the Private Calendar, (Mr. JOYCE in the chair.)

D. T. KIRBY.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 909) for the relief of D. T. Kirby.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Army are hereby suspended for the purpose of this act, and only so far as they affect D. T. Kirby, late a captain and brevet colonel in the United States Army; and the President can, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said D. T. Kirby to a captaincy in the Army, and that he shall be assigned to the first vacancy occurring in his grade in the infantry arm of the service: Provided, however, That no pay, compensation, or allowance shall be given to said D. T. Kirby for the period he was out of the service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read. I think the reports should be read on all those bills.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 909) to restore D. T. Kirby, late captain and brevet colonel United States Army, in his grade in the infantry arm of the service, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

That the committee find the facts to be as stated in House Report No. 680, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, which said report is hereto annexed and made part of this report, and is as follows:

"[House Report No. 680, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.]

"The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3140) for the relief of D. T. Kirby, respectfully report:

"That on the breaking out of the war of the rebellion, D. T. Kirby was one of the first of the citizens of Missouri to offer his services to the General Government, and that he recruited, maintained, and organized an infantry company of one hundred men, which was mustered into the service in June, 1861, as Company E, Eighth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and of which he was mustered as captain. In the same month he accompanied his regiment to the field, when it joined the troops under Grant, at Paducah, Kentucky, and thereafter made part of the army that captured Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, and thereafter took part in the battles of Shiloh and Corinth, and all of the marches, battles, sieges, and assaults of the Army of the Tennessee that resulted in the capture of Arkansas Post, Vicksburgh, Mission Ridge, Atlanta, Savannah, and Jonesborough, and culminated in the surrender of Johnston's army of the Tennessee, at Durham Station, in North Carolina.

"During this four years he held, consecutively, the commissions of captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel, received four severe wounds, and was an active, intelligent, daring officer, and at the conclusion of the war was honorably mustered out of the military service of the United States with the brevet commissions of colonel and brigadier-general of volunteers, and the highest commendation from Generals Grant, Sherman, Logan, Blair, and other officers with whom he served.

"In 1866, on the reorganization of the regular Army, he was appointed a captain of the Thirty-ninth United States Infantry, and received the regular brevets of major, for Chickasaw Bayou, Mississippi; lieutenant-colonel, for assault on Vicksburgh; and colonel, for Mission Ridge, Tennessee, and Rivers Bridge, South Carolina.

"In 1868, while serving with his regiment at Fort Pike, Louisiana, he was court-martialed on various charges and specifications. There were seven officers detailed for this trial, who assembled at the time and place named in the order. The accused and the judge-advocate declined to challenge any one of the detail, and the court was accordingly organized with seven members, and proceeded with the trial. On the sixth day of the trial one of the members of the court was excused from further attendance on account of sickness, and at the same time the judge-advocate challenged the president of the court because he believed him to be favorably disposed toward the accused. The accused objected to the court entertaining the challenge, declaring the judge-advocate's motion to be in violation of all law and precedents governing criminal trials both in civil and military courts, and especially repugnant to the eight hundred and eighty-ninth paragraph of the Army regulations, which declares that 'the seventy-sixth article of war does not confer on a court-martial the power to punish its own members.'

"Notwithstanding this objection of the accused, the court determined to entertain the challenge, and on further motion of the prosecution it ordered the accused and his counsel to be excluded from the court-room, and, with closed doors, spent nine days in trying the challenge, when, in open session, it sustained the challenge, and, dismissing the president, proceeded with five members to the conclusion of the trial, when it pronounced the sentence of dismissal against the accused.

"When this action of the court came before the department commander who had ordered the court, for his review and official action, he said of it:

"'The action of the court in declaring the seat of General Mower vacant after he had been duly sworn to properly try the case, and the trial had commenced, was a fatal error in its proceedings.'

"In view of the fact that the charges were not fully sustained by the evidence, that the court was unquestionably disorganized by the entirely illegal expulsion of the president and incapable of pronouncing a valid sentence, and the fact that the act of July 13, 1866, (Statutes at Large, vol. 14, p. 92,) declares that 'no officer in the military or naval service of the United States shall, in time of peace, be dismissed from service except upon and in pursuance of the sentence of a court-martial to that effect, or in commutation thereof,' and of the exceptionally good war record of this officer, your committee report the accompanying substitute for said bill, (H. R. 3140,) and recommend that it be passed."

The committee therefore adopt said House report as the report of this committee, and report the accompanying bill for his relief, with the recommendation that it do pass.

APPENDIX.

HEADQUARTERS SEVENTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
Louisville, Kentucky, June 16, 1865.

GENERAL: I have the honor to request that Dennis T. Kirby, lieutenant-colonel Twenty-seventh Missouri Infantry, now on duty with me as picket-officer, be brevetted brigadier-general.

Lieutenant-Colonel Kirby entered the service in May, 1861, as captain Eighth Missouri Regiment, and with his regiment participated in the Missouri campaigns and battles of Fort Donelson and Shiloh. During the advance on Corinth he was promoted to major for gallantry at Russell House. He again distinguished himself at Chickasaw Bayou, and was wounded at Arkansas Post, after which he participated in the campaign against Vicksburg, when, in the first assault, he volunteered to lead the storming column. He had charge of the advance which crossed the Tennessee River in ponton boats and captured the enemy's pickets, the success of which contributed so much to the grand and decisive results of the battles which followed. He commanded his regiment up to Kenesaw Mountain. In August, 1864, he was transferred to the Twenty-seventh Missouri, after which he served upon my staff as picket-officer. He was wounded while leading a cavalry charge, February 2, 1865, near Rivers Bridge, in the campaign from Pocataligo to Goldsborough. He has never been absent from his command on sick leave or furlough. I think that this promotion would be but a just acknowledgment of his distinguished service.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FRANK P. BLAIR,
Major-General.

Major-General JOHN A. RAWLINS,
Chief of Staff, Washington.

[Indorsement on the foregoing.]

Approved and respectfully forwarded to the Secretary of War.

U. S. GRANT.

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES ARMY, June 23, 1865.

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
Saint Louis, April 30, 1866.

I take pleasure in recommending to favor Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby, United States Volunteers. He served under me in various capacities during the whole war, and was universally esteemed a most active, intelligent, and zealous officer. I shall deem it but an act of justice if he should receive from the Government of the United States an acknowledgment of his merits and services.

W. T. SHERMAN.
Major-General.

[Indorsement on the foregoing.]

I concur in the statement of General Sherman as to the merits of Brevet Major-General D. Kirby. He proved himself to be a gallant and meritorious officer.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant-General.

JUNE 2, 1866.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 29, 1866.

To whom it may concern:

Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby served under my command during the time I had command of the Army of the Tennessee. He was remarkable for his gallantry on the field. I saw him near Rivers Bridge charge the enemy at the head of a small regiment of mounted infantry, when he was wounded. He showed great energy at all times, and specially distinguished himself as chief of staff of the Seventeenth Army Corps. I take great pleasure in bearing testimony to the brilliant military record of General Kirby, and trust he may be able to reap abundant fruits of his energetic and faithful labors during the war.

Respectfully,

O. O. HOWARD,
Major-General, United States Volunteers.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN, AND ABANDONED LANDS,
Washington, July 19, 1866.

SIR: I desire to call your attention to the eminent services of Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby, formerly lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-seventh Missouri Infantry. When I took command of the Army of the Tennessee, General Kirby was the chief picket officer of the Seventeenth Army Corps, a position requiring more than ordinary sagacity, intelligence, and bravery. In Colonel Kirby these qualifications were found to a remarkable degree. He was prompt and energetic, and when I knew that a line had been placed or inspected by him, I knew that it was well done. During the time that I was in command of the army, he was often selected to conduct hazardous expeditions. He was wounded in a cavalry charge which he was leading, near Rivers Bridge, South Carolina. I have had frequent occasion to witness his coolness and bravery in dangerous positions.

He desires to enter the regular Army, and I heartily recommend him for the position he seeks.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. O. HOWARD,
Major-General, United States Volunteers.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, July 23, 1866.

SIR: I wish to call your attention to the services of General Kirby, formerly lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-seventh Missouri Infantry. I am well acquainted with his services, having served under and with me in the Army of the Tennessee from its organization up to the disbandment of the same. He was at all times a faithful, energetic, and gallant officer, many times performing service deeds, and always doing his duty; he was often selected to do particular service on account of his daring and good judgment; he was severly wounded during the march of the army through South Carolina. No man is better qualified than he to fill a position in the regular Army. I would be greatly pleased to see him placed there, where he would certainly be of service to his country, and have his good offices appreciated by the Government.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. LOGAN.
(Late) Major-General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 11, 1866.

To the President:

It is with pleasure that I bear witness to the military character of Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby, who is an applicant for a position in the Regular Army. General K. entered the service early in the war, and arose to his position as a general officer by merit and capacity. He was for a long time on the staff of General Blair, and his bravery, energy, and military conduct attracted the attention of other officers, and caused him to sustain a reputation as good as the best.

I have observed his conduct frequently, and hence am led to believe that the service will be benefited by his appointment to a grade equal to his merit, and sincerely trust that he may succeed in his application.

Very respectfully,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Late Brevet Major-General Fourth Division, Seventeenth Corps.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 14, 1866.

SIR: I would respectfully recommend Brevet Brigadier-General Kirby to your favorable notice, and urge that he receive an appointment in the permanent military service of the United States. General Kirby commenced at the very outbreak of the late war and served through the whole of that struggle, sustaining himself with great credit. He is an able officer, and I hope may receive the position that his services, patriotism, and ability entitle him to.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN M. OLIVER.
Brevet Major-General Volunteers.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

SAINT LOUIS, July 14, 1866.

To the President:

I desire to recommend Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby for an appointment in the Regular Army. General Kirby served with his regiment, the Eighth Missouri Volunteer Infantry, of which he was major, and the Twenty-seventh Missouri Volunteer Infantry, of which he was lieutenant-colonel, with great distinction during the late war. Both of these regiments were under my command, and I was personally acquainted with the great merit of this officer; when anything was to be done requiring more than usual courage, zeal, and intelligence, Kirby was almost certain to be selected to lead the enterprise. Subsequently Colonel Kirby served on my staff as the chief picket officer of the Seventeenth Army Corps. In this position he was of great assistance to me. I always felt certain that every duty that devolved on him would be performed with the greatest zeal and alacrity. He was universally regarded by his superior officers as one of the most intrepid and skillful officers in our Army. He was severely wounded in a cavalry charge near Rivers Bridge, in South Carolina, and brevetted as colonel and brevet brigadier-general for his gallantry and good conduct. He has earned an appointment in the regular Army, if any man in the volunteer service can be said to have earned such an appointment, and he will do honor to any commission which your excellency may confer upon him.

Yours, truly,

FRANK P. BLAIR.

WASHINGTON, August 7, 1866.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I respectfully request that you appoint Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby to be a major in the reorganized Army of the United States. His military record is clear; his testimonials from superior officers under whom he served during the late war ample and eulogistic; wounds attest his devotion; his discharge from the volunteer service is honorable and satisfactory. He seeks to use the skill attained in service to promote the glory of his country, and would spend his life in a pursuit into which he early entered in the hour of peril and doubt. He entered the service from my State and my district, and I but express its appreciation of him as a gentleman and officer by, in their name, soliciting for him your kind recognition in the office I ask for him.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN HOGAN.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS,
Washington, D. C., August 7, 1866.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I respectfully request that you appoint Brevet Brigadier-General Dennis T. Kirby to be a major in the reorganized Army of the United States. His military record is clear; his testimonials from superior officers under whom he served during the late war ample and eulogistic; wounds attest his devotion; his discharge from the volunteer service is honorable and satisfactory. He seeks to use the skill attained in service to promote the glory of his country, and would spend his life in a pursuit into which he early entered in the hour of peril and doubt. He entered the service from my State and my district, and I but express its appreciation of him as a gentleman and an officer by, in their name, soliciting for him your kind recognition in the office I ask for him.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN HOGAN.

[Indorsement on the foregoing.]

General Kirby has applied for a captaincy, but his service entitles him to the majority which I understand will open from Missouri. I hope the President will give it to him. As Mr. Hogan states, no man has done better service than General Kirby. All his superiors attest his capacity, courage, and devotion to the country. He is a great favorite also with those who served under him, and with the people of Missouri.

M. BLAIR.

AUGUST 9, 1866.

SILVER SPRING, August 25, 1866.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Frank writes desiring his brother and me to promote as far as we can the appointment of General Kirby in the regular service. I know of no better means than stating the facts as to his deserts in as few words as possible. He is a self-made man, beginning to work for himself at the age of fourteen without means. He gave up the little business on which he was thriving at the commencement of the rebellion, and, raising a company at his own expense in Saint Louis, began in aiding Frank's efforts there. He rose in his regiment through all the grades to lieutenant-colonel, and was mustered out with it after three years' service. He then re-entered the service as lieutenant-colonel of Twenty-seventh Regiment Missouri Volunteers. He was immediately detailed as chief picket officer of Seventeenth Army Corps, and was successively brevetted colonel and brigadier-general on active service to the close of the war. He fought as captain at the battles of Fort Henry, Fort Donelson, at Shiloh, Chickasaw Bayou, Arkansas Post, Champion Hills, Jackson, and siege of Vicksburgh. After Vicksburgh, as lieutenant-colonel, he was engaged in the battles of Chattanooga, Resaca, Dallas, and Kenesaw Mountain, and then as chief picket officer in all the battles and skirmishes his position involved on Sherman's advance to Atlanta, and the march to the seaboard, and the point at Johnston's surrender. General Howard, in his recommendation, says, 'He was chief picket officer' in the van of his army, and adds, 'a position requiring more than ordinary sagacity, intelligence, and bravery. In Colonel Kirby these qualifications were found to a remarkable degree. He was prompt and energetic, and when I knew that a line had been placed or inspected by him, I knew that it was well done. He was often selected to conduct hazardous expeditions. I have had frequent occasion to witness his coolness and bravery in dangerous positions.' He heartily recommends him for the position he seeks. General Sherman recommends and says: 'He served under me in various capacities during the war, and was universally esteemed a most active, intelligent, and zealous officer. I shall deem it but an act of justice if he should receive from the Government of the United States an acknowledgment of his merit and services.' On this General Grant indorses: 'I concur in the statement of General Sherman as to merits of Brevet Brigadier-General Kirby. He proved himself a most gallant and meritorious officer.' Generals Logan, Belknap, and Blair, under whom he served, go more into detail, and accord the highest praise. He was thrice severely wounded, and had three horses shot under him.

With great regard, yours, affectionately,

F. P. BLAIR.

WASHINGTON CITY, August 27, 1866.

To His Excellency the President:

Your attention is respectfully called to the recommendations which the State of Missouri (through her Representatives) has made concerning the appointment of Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby (late chief picket officer Seventeenth Army Corps) to the position of major, United States Army.

Since the interview between your excellency and the delegates of Missouri to the Philadelphia convention headed by Hon. John Hogan, at which time the abovementioned recommendations were handed you, we have learned that the name of George W. Schofield has been placed upon the list for appointment to be accredited to Missouri. General Schofield is not and never was a resident of the State of Missouri. He is and has been a resident of the State of Illinois. It is true that in the latter part of 1861 he received a commission in a Missouri regiment, of which his brother (Major-General John M. Schofield) was major.

We have recommended General Kirby as a Missourian, who resided there before the war, and who in 1861 was one of the first to rush to the defense of the Government. His course through the war is a matter of history; no officer, regular or volunteer, can show a better record. He is a self-made man, relying not upon the influence of relations for promotion, but, as the testimonials of Generals Grant, Sherman, Howard, Blair, Logan, Smith, and other officers with whom he has served will show, he has, by his zeal, devotion, fearless bravery, and good judgment, advanced himself from a captaincy in the Eighth Missouri to the position of brevet brigadier-general and chief picket officer of the Seventeenth Army Corps. We have been led to believe that Missouri should receive one of the majorities in the Army. If so, we present again the name of D. T. Kirby as the choice of Missouri; and in this connection allow us to say that General Schofield neither claims to be nor is he recognized by us as a resident of Missouri. Therefore we ask that our petitions and recommendations be not ignored without just and reasonable cause, but simply ask you to do justice, and render unto Missouri that which is due to Missouri.

On behalf of the Missouri delegation to the Philadelphia convention and the Union conservative people of Missouri.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
January 14, 1880.

I certify the foregoing are true copies of the original letters of recommendation on file in this office.

SAMUEL BRECK,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. SPARKS. If there be no objection, I ask that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. CAMP. I make the point that the objection of the gentleman is too late after the reading of the report. Reading the report is a consideration of the bill, and the objection must be made before consideration.

Mr. STEELE. I rose to make objection before the report was read.

Mr. SPARKS. The rule, I think, is this: that a member may make his objection conditionally, making his right to object the condition upon which the report may be read. But if he waives that objection after the reading of the report, according to the ruling in this House ever since I have been here, he is precluded from raising any objection afterward.

Mr. STEELE. I merely consented that the report be read for information.

Mr. BROWNE. I suppose my colleague [Mr. STEELE] does not object to the consideration of the bill, but merely desires the floor that he may oppose it.

Mr. STEELE. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair understood. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana to oppose the bill.

Mr. STEELE. My objection to this bill is not based upon the ground that I do not think Mr. Kirby was a gallant officer. All the testimony goes to show that he was. But I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that all this array of evidence, or nearly all of it, was furnished Lieutenant Kirby in order that he might obtain his commission in the regular Army, and before the occurrence of the trial.

It has been often said that there is a disposition on the part of the regulars or of the Military Academy men to purge the Army of the volunteers. To do away with that objection, I wish to state that of the seven members left of that court five were from the volunteer service.

I wish to call attention now to the charges upon which Lieutenant Kirby was tried.

Charge first. "Conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman."

Specification first. "In this: that he, Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth United States Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, did, without just cause or provocation, forcibly and violently eject from the sutler store, and otherwise treat in an ungentlemanly manner by violently forcing him to swallow a glass of whisky, one John Adamson, a civilian clerk in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 27th day of April, 1868."

On the first specification the finding was "not guilty."

Specification second. "In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, did challenge one J. L. Duval, a civilian engineer in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department, to a pugilistic encounter, designating the wharf at Fort Pike as the rendezvous, and upon the failure of the said Duval to meet him at the place specified, did return and say to the aforementioned Duval: 'You are a damned coward,' or words to that effect, and did use highly indecent and ungentlemanly and threatening language toward him, the said Duval. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 11th day of June, 1868."

On the second specification the finding was "guilty" except the words—

Challenge one J. L. Duval, a civilian engineer in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department to a pugilistic encounter, designating the wharf at Fort Pike as a rendezvous, and upon the failure of the said Duval to meet him at the place specified, did return and.

Specification third. "In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, having ordered his orderly, Private Green Wood, Company K, Thirty-ninth United States Infantry, to tell one John Adamson, a civilian clerk in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department, that he wished to see him, and having received the answer that he, the said Adamson, was busy, did order the beforementioned orderly to deliver to said Adamson a highly indecent and ungentlemanly message. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 11th day of June, 1868."

On the third specification the finding was—

"Guilty" except the words "having ordered his orderly, private Green Wood, Company K, Thirty-ninth Infantry, to tell one John Adamson, a civilian clerk in the employ of the Quartermaster Department, that he wished to see him, and having received the answer that he, the said Adamson, was busy."

Specification fourth. "In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, did expose himself in a drunken condition to the garrison, and otherwise behaved in an ungentlemanly manner by using profane and indecent language within hearing of the ladies of the garrison. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 11th day of June, 1868."

On the fourth specification the finding was "guilty."

Specification fifth. "In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, did insult the wife of an officer of the Thirty-ninth Infantry, and did attempt violence upon her person. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 17th day of June, 1868."

On the fifth specification the finding was "guilty."

On the charge the finding was "guilty."

Charge second. "Violation of the thirty-ninth article of war."

Specification. "In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, having obtained from Captain J. M. Hamilton, Thirty-ninth United States Infantry, treasurer of the post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, the sum of $100 of the post fund on the pretense of purchasing books for the post library, at New Orleans, where he was going, did not purchase the books or return the money on his return; and upon being questioned by Captain Hamilton what he had done with it replied: 'I got on a spree in New Orleans and spent the money,' or words to that effect. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 9th day of March, 1868."

On the specification the finding was "guilty."

On the charge the finding was—

Not guilty, but guilty of conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline.

Charge third. "Violation of the forty-fifth article of war."

Specification first. "In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, was so drunk as to be unable properly to perform his duties as commanding officer. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 7th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th days of June, 1868."

On the first specification the finding was—

Guilty, excepting the words "13th," "14th," and "15th."

Specification second. "In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, was too drunk to take command of his battalion on parade, and after the line had been formed half an hour, more or less, when the post adjutant sent word to that effect to him he, the said Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Kirby being incapacitated for duty by liquor, ordered the next officer in rank to take command of the parade. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 17th day of June, 1868."

On the second specification the finding was "not guilty."

On the charge the finding was "guilty."

Charge fourth. "Conduct to the prejudice of good order and military discipline."

Specification first. "In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, did drink liquor and associate familiarly with Ordnance Sergeant Thomas Cooney, an enlisted man in the United States Army, until they were both more or less drunk, and did then behave in a riotous and disorderly manner by loud talking and speech-making and discussion with the sergeant. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 5th day of April, 1868."

On the first specification the finding was:

Guilty, excepting the words "drink liquor and," and the words "until they were both more or less drunk," and the word "then;" also excepting the words "riotous and."

Specification second. "In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding post of Fort Pike, Louisiana, did assault one John Adamson, a civilian clerk in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department, by repeatedly slapping him in the face with his hands, in the presence of enlisted men of the command. This at Fort Pike, Louisiana, on or about the 11th day of June, 1868."

On the second specification the finding was:

Guilty, excepting the word "repeatedly."

On the charge the finding was "guilty."

The sentence was:

And the court does therefore sentence him, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth United States Infantry, "to be cashiered."

II. In conformity with the 65th of the Rules and Articles of War, the proceedings of the general court-martial in the foregoing case have been forwarded to the Secretary of War, and by him submitted to the President of the United States, and the proceedings, findings, and sentence are approved.

III. Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth United States Infantry, accordingly ceases to be an officer of the Army from the date of this order.

By command of General Grant.

In addition, I will say that I have it officially from the War Department, that there are complaints in the case of this officer which affect his integrity.

In regard to the legality of the trial, I wish to say that the court was duly organized and proceeded to the trial of this case. It had gone on with the trial some five days, when the judge-advocate of the court, in despite of the fact that the president of the court, General Mower, was the commanding officer of the post, yet although a gallant soldier he was a man of prejudice, and was so prejudiced in favor of Mr. Kirby that the judge-advocate had to object to his further action on the court. For that purpose he asked the court-room to be cleared. They proceeded with the trial of the challenge of this member of the court, and were engaged in that trial some nine days, General Mower all the time being present. At the end of the nine days it was decided that General Mower should no longer sit as a member of the court.

The evidence showed that during the trial of this challenge General Mower tried to intimidate the judge-advocate, to shut him up, by writing on a slip of paper charges against the judge-advocate, in order that the judge-advocate might withdraw the charge against General Mower, and allow him to remain upon the court. Page 81 of the record of the court shows that General Mower tried to keep from being brought into court the charge relating to the lady referred to. On page 88 of the record, Captain Hammond, a witness, swears that General Mower, by his looks or otherwise, endeavored to intimidate him from giving a free expression of his testimony in that court.

Mr. HENDERSON. I dislike exceedingly to interrupt my friend, but I wish to make a single statement in this connection. The testimony, which I have read with some care, says expressly that the witness denied that he was intimidated. Although the court, by the questions propounded to the witness, seemed anxious to make it appear that he was intimidated, he denied that such was the case.

Mr. STEELE. I will read from the record:

Question by the court. Did or did not the action of General Mower render it difficult for you to give your testimony in a straightforward manner?

Answer. No, sir; it did not embarrass me to that extent.

By the court. You have just stated that at the first you were a little embarrassed. Was that embarrassment more than a witness naturally or generally feels upon being called to testify?

A. I cannot say. I think the stare of the general caused me to feel uneasy for a short time at first.

That is the point. The stare of the general embarrassed him. In addition to this, after the court had found this officer guilty and before the findings were announced he was drunk and charges were preferred against him and were forwarded to General Mower, but they were not entertained. I will read what his attorney said to the court of officers trying him. After they had gone on the trial in this court the attorney says:

The whole case is overdrawn and imaginary on paper. The testimony shows improprieties undoubtedly, but no offense under military law demanding and justifying a conviction.

Now, pay particular attention to this:

Officers of the Army are the most generous of men. Their very occupation causes them to be self-abnegating and charitable. To no source can anybody look so confidently for liberality. Peccadilloes are overlooked in the minds of merciful men.

Mr. CLARDY. What is the gentleman reading?

Mr. STEELE. That is what was said in this case by the attorney of Mr. Kirby, speaking to the officers of the court. Notwithstanding that they found this officer guilty.

Mr. SPARKS. That is the speech to the jury.

Mr. STEELE. It is the speech to the court. Now, should this bill pass it would put Mr. Kirby 93 on the list of officers. When he went out he was No. 299. He would gain 206 files while he has been out of the Army.

Mr. CLARDY. I want to correct the gentleman. The passage of this bill would put Mr. Kirby nowhere. It would only authorize the President, in his discretion, to appoint him.

Mr. McCOOK. And the President would consider the bill directory, as he has always done in such cases.

Mr. HENDERSON. It would be a new appointment.

Mr. McCOOK. It would put him in his old grade.

Mr. STEELE. It would open the doors to two hundred and twenty-one officers who have gone out since 1866. Of that number there were appointed from the Military Academy, 10; from civil life with no prior service, 119; from ex-volunteers, 28; and from the Army ranks, 44. Many of these two hundred and one officers have been dismissed for less offenses than have been alleged and found against Colonel Kirby.

This is a brief statement of the case. As to the point that the President may appoint him, I will say that he is authorized to appoint him. I wish to show what is the effect of appointment. I will read from Blake vs. The United States:

If the court had proceeded illegally, the action of the President and of the Senate legalized it. Admitting that there is an irregularity of the court, they went on and tried the case. And where the President appoints and the Senate confirms it legalizes the action of the court.

If the President should to-day appoint A or B General of the Army, and the Senate should confirm that appointment, it would vacate the office of General of the Army to-day. That you will find in the case of Blake vs. the United States, 13 Supreme Court Reports, 229.

As I before said, none can deny that Kirby was a gallant officer. But if we wish to appoint gallant officers we have over 2,000 equally as worthy as Kirby and who have not been tried and found wanting. If we wish to appoint officers on account of their gallant conduct would it not be more becoming in us to select some who have not been weighed in the balance and found wanting?

I will now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] a portion of my time—so much as he may desire.

Mr. BRAGG. I prefer to speak in my own time.

Mr. BROWNE. I am willing to occupy part of the gentleman's time to speak on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. I will reserve my time.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure but that the report in this case presents it more clearly than I can present it. This soldier was in the Army four years and more during the late war; he obtained the rank of a brevet brigadier-general, and at the close of the war, upon the recommendation of the officer who had commanded the various divisions and corps in which he had served, he was appointed a captain in the regular Army. Subsequently, while in command at Fort Pike, Louisiana, he was unfortunate enough to get the ill will of some gentlemen who were serving with him and under him. Perhaps, too, he was indiscreet. (It is fair to say that.) These officers preferred charges against him; a court-martial was organized; he was tried, convicted, and dismissed the service. The application now is that the sentence of the court-martial be set aside and that the President of the United States be allowed to appoint him to the rank in the Army which he held at the time of his dismissal by the sentence of the court-martial.

This bill is drawn very broadly as against the soldier. It provides that—

The President can, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said D. T. Kirby to a captaincy in the Army, and that he shall be assigned to the first vacancy occurring in his grade in the infantry arm of the service.

The President, "if he so desires," can appoint this man "in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment," is, you perceive, the language of the bill. Now, gentlemen say this provision is regarded as obligatory or mandatory upon the President. That, sir, cannot be possible. This phraseology cannot be tortured into anything like an obligation upon the President to make this appointment if, in his judgment, it is one that ought not to be made.

Now, sir, this being the mild request of this soldier, I proceed to consider how he got out of the service. Under the law—I have it not before me, but state it from recollection—a court-martial ought to consist, when it conveniently can, of thirteen members; but it may consist of a less number, in no case, however, of less than five. I presume that all military men who are paying attention to what I am saying will recognize this as a correct statement of the law regulating the composition of courts-martial. In this case a court was organized to consist of seven members, of whom General Mower was president.

After the court had proceeded some four days with the examination of witnesses a member of the court became sick and was relieved from duty, (all the members having been taken without objection originally.) At the period referred to the judge-advocate made a charge and filed specifications against General Mower, the president of the court, whereupon the remaining five members constituted themselves a court-martial and considered these charges against the president. Excluding the accused Kirby and his counsel, they proceeded with the trial of their own president for nine days. They convicted him and turned him out. That action, as stated by the judge-advocate, proceeded upon the theory that he (the president) was prejudiced in favor of Kirby. Something in his looks or some casual remark had impressed a conviction upon the mind of this sagacious judge-advocate that the president of the court was partial to Kirby, the accused. Hence they tried him upon that issue of prejudice and he was convicted and dismissed from the court; and the remaining five men who had thus found the president of the court partial to the accused and turned him out on that account then proceeded to try General Kirby, who was by them quite easily found guilty and dismissed the service. That is the way this brave soldier was turned out of the Army of the United States.

Now, there is not a military man who hears me that does not know that this finding was the merest bosh. The law is that when a court-martial is once organized and accepted for the trial of a case a member can be relieved only by the action of the commander organizing the court, on account of sickness or other disability. But these five members of this court proceeded to try their president, and turn him out, against the protest of the accused and his counsel, and in their absence, after a nine days' trial, and then go on and find Kirby guilty.

The commander of the district disapproved of this action, but, strange to say, the Judge-Advocate-General approved it. Now I state the fact to be—the testimony is too voluminous for me to attempt to read it—that the Judge-Advocate-General bases approval of the sentence upon the theory that the president of the court was relieved on his own request and by order of the commander. In discussing the question, he takes the correct view that the proceedings of the court would be null and void so far as this trial is concerned but for the fact that the president had asked to be relieved and was relieved at his own request, and therefore the finding of the five remaining members, one other member having been properly relieved on account of sickness, was correct, &c. But the Judge-Advocate-General misstates the facts. This court-martial was organized to try several cases, not this case alone, and the president having become disgusted and outraged at the action of the other officers dismissing him from this case, did subsequently ask to be relieved so far as the remaining cases were concerned, and was accordingly relieved. That is the correct statement of the case.

The commander makes this quite clear in a communication of his from which I will now read. In speaking of the view taken by the Judge-Advocate-General, he says:

The Judge-Advocate-General, in the opinion which he has given, appended to the proceedings, assumes that I relieved General Mower, at his own request, as a member of the court, in this particular case. This opinion is erroneous. When this application to be relieved was laid before me, I was informed that the court had already decided that his seat should be vacated. The court, when convened, was ordered to try such other cases as might be properly brought before it. I thought that it would be a very unpleasant position for General Mower to occupy should other cases be brought before it for trial, inasmuch as he would be perfectly competent to occupy his seat in any other case than that of Colonel Kirby. While thus competent, the action of the court would probably have been a source of constant irritation between himself and the other members.

There it is in a nutshell. He was relieved after they had insulted him; after they had tried him; after they had dismissed him from the presidency of the court. He then became disgusted, and asked to be relieved from further service with the five gentlemen who had committed so outrageous and high-handed an act as to the other cases then pending before the court, and I presume any other gentleman with proper self-respect would have done precisely the same thing.

Mr. STEELE. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. SPARKS. I am reading the communication of the commander who organized the court, which I find printed among others in the papers and documents of this case.

Mr. STEELE. Printed by whose authority?

Mr. SPARKS. Printed like all these documents. It is a communication from the commander. Does the gentleman doubt its correctness?

Now, Mr. Chairman, life is too short, our time particularly in this House is too short, to discuss questions like this. I say this board or court when it made these findings was a nullity, and could not make any finding which was not void. Look at the state of the case. Five men out of a court composed of seven did it, and did it after turning out their president; they did what they had no power to do.

I will direct attention, however, on this point to the opinions of some of the best lawyers we have in this country on that subject. The first I refer to is that of Shellabarger and Wilson of this city.

They are widely and well known as good lawyers; the opinion is on this case.

The question you submit for our opinions is, whether the record in that case shows such defects in its proceedings as render the judgment in the case void. We answer this question in the affirmative without hesitation. We will not enter into any discussion of the case, and will only indicate some of the leading grounds upon which we base the opinion that the expulsion of the president of the said court by the other members thereof, after that court had been duly and fully organized, and had proceeded in the trial some seven days, or the expulsion of defendant and his counsel from the court while the court took testimony and tried the question of the expulsion of the president of the court, are elements of the record which destroy wholly the judgment in the case.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPARKS. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Does the gentleman know what counsel-fee was paid for that opinion?

Mr. SPARKS. I do not. I think, however, these gentlemen have disclaimed being counsel in the case.

Now I call attention to another legal opinion, and it is that of a lawyer of the eminence of Montgomery Blair, who examined this matter. His letter is rather bitter in denunciation of the whole proceeding. He says it was "a nullity;" that it was an "outrage upon common sense, as well as upon law" that this board should have proceeded to do what it did. He said in conclusion:

The proceeding was, indeed, manifestly a high-handed and lawless one, taken under the influence of strong passions, and a foregone conclusion against the accused.

The next opinion to which I shall call attention is that of Judge Jeremiah S. Black. He begins his communication with the statement—

I am nobody's counsel in this case, but at the request of General Ewing and in the interest of justice I have looked at the record, and am now about to say what conclusion it has brought me to.

Further on Judge Black says as follows:

When this court-martial determined that the officer appointed to preside in it should not sit at the hearing, or participate in its deliberations, or have a voice in pronouncing the sentence, they broke up the court, and all their subsequent proceedings were unlawful.

He concludes as follows:

Soldiers are excusable for not knowing much law, but I wonder these gentlemen did not see by the light of their common sense that they were committing a blunder palpable enough to make all their proceedings void.

Now, that is the legal opinion of Judge Black, who has examined this matter with care, an eminent lawyer, and the caption of his letter is that he is "nobody's counsel in this case." I understand that General Ewing, of this city, was the counsel in the case.

So much for the court-martial. What are these charges? I propose briefly to go to the bottom of the whole case. If the court was illegal of course its findings are null and void, and that ends the whole matter. That this was so cannot, as I think, be questioned. But I will look briefly, as my colleague on the committee [Mr. STEELE] has done, at the charges brought against this officer. I desire to repeat again, Mr. Chairman, that this officer was beyond question guilty of an indiscretion. He is charged with conduct unbecoming an officer. It is stated that under the influence of liquor he went to the engine-room where there were some civil employés engaged, and ordered them not to do what they were then doing. They were, as he alleged, making too much noise. One of these employés becoming impertinent to the colonel, he fired up and said to the man he was a coward or some like expression. Perhaps he used an oath. The employé, putting on brave airs, said: "Colonel, are you armed?" The colonel, answering, said that he was, and that "if he didn't mind he would shoot him," or something of that sort, adding some expressions perhaps that are not used in polite society.

Now, that is about all of that. Here is a civilian employé who undertakes to bully the commander of the post, and the commander of the post being Colonel Kirby does not allow himself to be bullied. That's about all there is to that. He is accused on the 11th of a certain month, and running for a period of six days, of being under the influence of drink, of being intoxicated, on a spree. That to a certain extent I think is true. On two or three days of that time I think the testimony shows quite clearly that he was drinking more than he ought to have drank; but he was not drunk. The testimony as a whole does not show that he was, in the ordinary sense, in a state of intoxication. The testimony is voluminous and conflicting, some declaring that he was to a certain extent under the influence of liquor but by no means drunk; and some to the effect that he was at some period of this time intoxicated. Now, draw the line somewhere and it will appear that the man was on something of a spree for two or three days; but it was confined solely to that, and it is not charged that he was subject to repeated or habitual intemperance. Now, sir, I would like to ask whether if you turn out all the military officers of the United States who, on some occasions, are known to take a drink or two too much, how many of them you are going to have left? I imagine if you do you will interfere very largely with the staff and line arrangement.

Another charge, Mr. Chairman, was, that he was intrusted with a hundred dollars of the post funds which were given to him when he was going to New Orleans to buy books for the library, in which he was himself interested. Now there is no doubt about that. He was intrusted with the money. He was requested to buy books. He did not buy the books; but the testimony shows that he did spend the money, and it has not been disputed. But when he came back he gave the reason why he did so; why he did not buy the books, and paid back the money. That is all there was of it. He never sought to detain anybody's money. He never attempted to defraud anybody, but, simply going to where these books could be obtained, the money was handed to him, a part of it being his own, (he being interested in the library as well as anybody connected with the post,) for the purpose of buying books, and all there is of it is that he did not buy the books but paid back the money.

Another charge is that he insulted a lady at the post. Now the facts are about as follows; and I will say here that originally when I looked into the case, and before examining it thoroughly, I thought that there might be something serious in that, but on examination I am satisfied that there was not. The colonel at this time was sick and confined to his bed. This lady upon whom it is alleged this indignity was offered was the wife of one of the lieutenants of the post, he being an enemy of Colonel Kirby. The testimony of the lady is conflicting and evasive, and not in harmony with her statements to her husband as detailed by him.

Other testimony is adduced showing that this interview of his with Kirby was in a public place, windows and doors all being open, and within ten feet of which was standing an armed sentinel, who testifies that he saw and heard nothing of this attempt to take improper liberties with the lady, but that Kirby was in bed sick under the care of the physician, and that when she came she shook hands with him, no more and no less. Another lady (the wife of Lieutenant Hanson) testified that she came into the colonel's room just as the other lady was leaving, and that she showed no signs of having been insulted, but that she was smiling as she past out of the room, &c. The testimony also shows that Kirby was in a marked degree courteous, civil and polite in his intercourse with ladies at all times. That is all there is in this. It is clear to my mind, looking at all the evidence on this point, that they wanted to make something of a case when there was no bottom to it.

On the contrary, the testimony goes to show that his action toward ladies was at all times of a different character; that he was ever reticent and retiring, but always a gallant, chivalrous gentleman, incapable of insulting a lady himself, and one who would be swift in avenging such insult by another. This charge against him is simply unworthy of consideration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the House but a moment longer. I have stated, I believe, all of the charges which have ever been preferred against this man by anybody, and have discussed those which have been passed upon by this court. Now, who is this man? He was a civilian appointment, but one of those that are occasionally hit, like that when they struck General Terry, (one of those whom God in his creation made a soldier,) the bravest of the brave; a man fitted in every way for the life of a soldier; a man whose whole career in the Army has been nothing but one of brilliancy; a man who has shed, with the rank he held, as much if not more glory upon the service than any man who served in the Army for the Union. Now let me read some of the commendations of him. He served under General F. P. Blair, of Missouri. I will not read all his letter, but condense it. He says:

Subsequently, Colonel Kirby served on my staff as the chief picket officer of the Seventeenth Army Corps; in this position he was of great assistance to me. I always felt certain that every duty that devolved on him would be performed with the greatest zeal and alacrity. He was universally regarded by his superior officers as one of the most intrepid and skillful officers in our Army.

He was severely wounded in a cavalry charge near Rivers Bridge, in South Carolina, and brevetted as colonel and brevet brigadier-general for his gallantry and good conduct.

FRANK P. BLAIR.

Now I will read what General Howard says about him:

When I took command of the Army of the Tennessee General Kirby was the chief picket officer of the Seventeenth Army Corps, a position requiring more than ordinary sagacity, intelligence, and bravery. In Colonel Kirby these qualifications were found to a remarkable degree. He was prompt and energetic, and when I knew that a line had been placed or inspected by him I knew that it was well done. During the time that I was in command of the army he was often selected to conduct hazardous expeditions. He was wounded in a cavalry charge which he was leading, near Rivers Bridge, South Carolina. I have had frequent occasion to witness his coolness and bravery in dangerous positions.

O. O. HOWARD,
Major-General United States Volunteers.

General Logan says:

He was at all times a faithful, energetic, and gallant officer, many times performing heroic deeds, and always doing his duty; he was often selected to do particular service on account of his daring and good judgment; he was severely wounded during the march of the army through South Carolina. No man is better qualified than he to fill a position in the regular Army.

JOHN A. LOGAN,
(Late) Major-General.

Then follows a letter in the same strain by Colonel Broadhead and some dozen others.

Here is General Sherman's letter:

I take pleasure in recommending to favor Brevet Brigadier-General D. T. Kirby, United States Volunteers. He served under me in various capacities during the whole war, and was universally esteemed a most active, intelligent, and zealous officer. I shall deem it but an act of justice if he should receive from the Government of the United States an acknowledgment of his merits and services.

W. T. SHERMAN,
Major-General.

And on General Sherman's letter is the following indorsement by General Grant:

I concur in the statement of General Sherman as to the merits of Brevet Major-General D. T. Kirby. He proved himself to be a most gallant and meritorious officer.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant-General.

Governor Fletcher says:

I knew him intimately while I was in service. He distinguished himself everywhere, and was in all the great battles of the West—at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, the assault and siege of Vicksburgh, Jackson, Mission Ridge, Atlanta, and was with Sherman on his grand "march to the sea." I think him as brave a man as Grant or Sherman ever commanded. He was more than once wounded, and was brevetted brigadier-general for his gallantry.

He is a gentleman of refinement and culture, as well as a good soldier. Few men possess so fully all the qualities that go to make up the thorough soldier and officer. I am very proud to have been his comrade in arms.

Very respectfully, yours.

THOMAS C. FLETCHER,
Governor of Missouri.

Governor Fletcher will be remembered as a very gallant officer during the war.

General Blair, in another letter, says:

He was thrice severely wounded, and had three horses shot under him.

Now, I ask the committee to look at that record. There is the man who has been turned out of the service, and his character stained upon frivolous charges like these, not sustained by the testimony, by a court absolutely illegal. He now comes to this House and asks that this stain on his character be so cleared up "that the President of the United States may, in his discretion," "if he desires to do so," "appoint him a captain in the Army," the place from which he was thus wrongfully dismissed; a man that was four times wounded in battle; a soldier who, at the head of his command, got near enough to the enemy to have three horses shot under him; a man who, from the General of the Army and the ex-General and from every major-general and brigadier under whom and with whom he served, has recommendations such as I have read, speaking of him as the bravest of the brave, peculiarly adapted to the military service. Can that kind of man not get the justice this bill asks for him? If that be so justice is indeed a "fickle jade," hard to win.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss this question longer. I have already occupied more time than I expected. I had hoped that this bill would pass in this mild form without any discussion. I am fully impressed with the conviction that it is an act of justice to a brave gallant soldier who, though he may have stumbled once or twice in life, has shown a record so bright that he could fall a dozen times and yet deserve the honor and respect of his country.

How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. SPARKS. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE.]

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, during the Forty-sixth Congress I had occasion to examine this whole question. I believe I read every word of the testimony and every line of the case that was presented to the Committee on Military Affairs, or that could be found in the War Department.

If there ever was a travesty on justice it was the proceedings of the court-martial by which General Kirby was tried. It hardly rose to the dignity of a judicial farce. After the court had proceeded for six days in the trial, it occurred to the judge-advocate, or to somebody else connected with the proceedings, that the president of the court was a friend of the accused, and the president was challenged. The court itself challenged itself.

Mr. HENDERSON. Or a part of itself.

Mr. BROWNE. Or a part of itself; and it then proceeded with closed doors, having excluded the accused and his counsel, to try the court, to try the president of it. It was a trial of the court itself, for the president was an essential part of it, and when he was stricken down the court in a legal sense disappeared.

I say the court was tried. The proceedings certainly affected the rights of the accused, and yet the accused was excluded from the court-room. He did not know why the court was challenged. He did not know what evidence was being introduced to sustain the charge that the court had made, or some member of it, against its president.

The accused was in jeopardy. If there were on the court one who was in sympathy with him, after having heard the proceedings for six days, he was entitled to have that one member to continue on the court until the close of the proceedings, even if his vote should happen to be in his favor. He was as much entitled to be present while the integrity of the court was on trial as he would have been had he been on trial before a civil court and a jury was being empanneled. Whoever heard of the accused being excluded from the court-room while they were selecting the jury by which he was to be tried?

I say the challenge was sustained, and the president of the court disappeared. The president of the court was nobody but General Joe Mower. My distinguished colleague [Mr. STEELE] perhaps remembers Joe Mower. A braver man never buckled about himself a saber or marched at the head of a column down into the smoke of the conflict. It was my good fortune to serve for a long time under the command of that distinguished chieftain, who has now been garnered with his dead comrades.

Yet Joe Mower, the gallant, chivalrous Joe Mower, was for some reason thought to be an improper man to sit at the head of a military tribunal by which a brother officer was to be tried. And Joe Mower went off the court, for what cause I do not know. I have never been able to find any reason in the record, though I have searched for it. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] tell me whether the proceedings of those eight or nine days are to be found in the record? I ask it of the gentleman as a favor to myself. Or will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] tell me?

Mr. STEELE. They are.

Mr. BROWNE. I never saw them. I do not know why, nor do I now care why he was relieved from further duty on that court.

Mr. HENDERSON. If my friend will allow me to say a single word——

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say that, after reading the proceedings of the court and all the testimony taken before the court, there was not in my opinion one single, solitary thing to justify the action of the court in relieving General Mower from further connection with it.

Mr. STEELE. I understood the gentleman to ask if the proceedings of the trial of the challenge of that member of the court was to be found in the record.

Mr. BROWNE. Yes. My question was whether the testimony against General Joe Mower was in the record. That was the question I put. I do not remember it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, it is there.

Mr. BROWNE. Well, the first conviction of this court-martial was the conviction of its own president. It disfranchised its own president from further proceeding on that trial. Now, so palpable a departure was this from every rule of justice and of law that the general commanding, in reviewing the case, said—I cannot use the exact language—that the proceedings were so irregular and illegal that he was unwilling to approve them; and for that reason he disapproved them, and with that indorsement on the record it was forwarded to the War Department. There they underwent the review of the Judge-Advocate General, and, for reasons that I need not now discuss, the proceedings of the court were approved.

I will not discuss in the presence of the lawyers of this House the question whether such proceedings could possibly stand in law. It appears that subsequently to the relieving of the president some one was substituted in his place as a member of the court. Probably the substituted person took his place in the court and acted with it to the end of the trial.

Now, that proceeding was even worse than the first. If it is true, as I now understand the record, not having seen it for some time, the interjecting into the case after it had been in progress for six days—or adding the nine days that the president of the court was himself on trial, making fifteen days—the interjecting into the court of another person was like putting another juror into a case on the trial of an ordinary proceeding at law after a part of the evidence had been heard. That is the character of the judicial proceeding by which General Kirby was convicted and dismissed the service. The next question that arises in the case is as to the character of the charges upon which he was tried. The charges were several. I do not know that I can repeat them. One charge was that of embezzlement of the post funds. That was briefly this: they had accumulated at the post a fund for the purpose of buying a post library. That fund was in the custody of the proper officer of the post. General Kirby, then Colonel Kirby, but I will designate him by his brevet rank—General Kirby had occasion to go from Fort Pike to the city of New Orleans, and he took this money along for the purpose, as he stated, of buying books for the post library. While he was there (there is no doubt upon this point, I think, according to the testimony) he became intoxicated and spent the money. Upon his return to the fort he gave an order upon his pay account for the sum, which was subsequently paid. Under the testimony the court found him not guilty of that charge, but found him guilty of conduct prejudicial to good order and military discipline.

It is clear that he was not guilty of embezzlement. He could not be guilty of legal embezzlement. He had not control of the fund in any official capacity, and therefore, in law, could not be guilty of that crime. He had been intrusted with the fund by its proper custodian; he applied it to his own account, and became indebted simply—no more and no less than that—he became indebted for the fund that he had thus appropriated; and this debt he discharged; so that no injury was done to any one.

Another charge was intoxication. Upon that charge, in my opinion, the testimony was conclusive against him. He was intoxicated on some day in June. It was perhaps during the 8th, 9th, 10th, and 11th of that month that all the circumstances occurred upon which these charges were founded.

The next charge is—and it is the serious charge in the case so far as the charges appear on record—that he insulted the wife of a brother officer. I read the testimony on this point with great care. General Kirby was lying sick—probably the result, to some extent, of the dissipation of the few days before. His quarters were upon the open parade-ground, surrounded on every side by the quarters of the troops. It was in the State of Louisiana, in the month of June, the testimony showing that the doors and windows were open. Seated at an open door or window within ten feet of the bed upon which the sick officer lay, was an orderly. This is not controverted.

The men of the camp were going along in front of the door and by the window constantly. In the light of day, a wife of an officer between whom and himself some difficulty had occurred, did go into his quarters.

Mr. McCOOK. Was she not sent for?

Mr. BROWNE. I do not remember. I will not say that such was not the case; but it is immaterial. She went. I need not repeat the testimony upon this point. If it is all true, the conduct of General Kirby was nothing more than rudeness—rudeness that I would not justify—rudeness that I would not attempt to palliate or mitigate. But all the circumstances in the case show conclusively to my mind that it was utterly untrue in fact. I have applied to it the rule of old Lord Mansfield which has stood upon the books for two generations: "Was the alleged occurrence in a public place; and did the person claiming to have been injured make outcry?"

Was not this transaction of the most public nature? Did the witness or person alleged to have been injured by the conduct of the officer feel that she had been insulted? Did her subsequent conduct show that such a thing as was subsequently alleged could have occurred or did occur? The testimony of the orderly—being of a negative character I do not urge it, of course, as a strong circumstance in the case—but the evidence of this orderly who sat at the window, (and certainly there is no reason to doubt its truth) is that he saw the two parties perhaps every minute, perhaps more frequently, and that nothing of the kind alleged happened. I do not say it might not have occurred, although the orderly occupied that position, without his having seen it; but I do say it is the most improbable fact imaginable that it should have occurred under such circumstances. The very surroundings forbid the idea that such a thing could have happened. More than that, the testimony showed that when the lady left the room, she did so smilingly, laughingly, perhaps stronger than this is the evidence that when the matter was circulated and she was comfronted with it, she denied it. This is not controverted; but the husband supplements this evidence by saying that he had instructed her to deny it.

I say taking the testimony—not giving the accused simply the benefit of the reasonable doubt to which every one charged with crime or misconduct is entitled under the law, but weighing it by its preponderance, considering the probabilities of the occurrence, they all challenge the truthfulness of the allegation.

There are some other charges I believe; but I have mentioned, according to my memory, the material charges in the case. There is a great contrariety of opinion in regard to the charge of drunkenness. Some of the witnesses state that General Kirby was bordering on delirium tremens; some of them charge that large numbers of bottles, perhaps barrels, of liquor had been consumed at his headquarters within a very short time. The testimony of the sutler and others, from whom the liquor must have been obtained, if obtained at all in the camp, would show that the quantity was very small; and one of the attending physicians testifies it was no more than he himself had ordered. I have now summarized the material charges, and very briefly adverted to the testimony as I remember it by which they were supported. Upon the record stating the facts as I have attempted to repeat them, there is a most terrible review of the case which purports to have been made by Judge Holt, then the Judge-Advocate-General—a gentleman for whose opinion, either upon a question of law or fact, I have great respect. Did I know that he had read this record, that he had passed upon it from a personal knowledge of its contents, I should doubt the conclusions to which I have arrived by my review of it. But I am forcibly struck with the belief that this record was reviewed by some subordinate in the Judge-Advocate-General's Office—some clerk who desired more to exhibit his rhetoric than to arrive at or state the plain conclusions to which the testimony would lead a reasonable mind.

Now, there is but a single question left to which I desire to call attention; and that is, what under the circumstances ought to be done? This bill does not restore General Kirby to the Army; it does not direct the President of the United States to commission him. It simply removes the disability imposed under the statutes by the finding of the court-martial. That is all. Till this is done the President cannot review the testimony and appoint General Kirby. The bill therefore simply allows the President, in the exercise of his discretion, to commission General Kirby to a captaincy.

Mr. McCOOK. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly.

Mr. McCOOK. In the event of the passage of the bill, what does the gentleman think would be the action of the President, judging from the action of previous Executive officers in similar cases? In other words, if this bill should pass both Houses of Congress, would not the President consider it as directory to him?

Mr. BROWNE. I think the bill is guarded. It is one which says "the President may, if he wishes, in the exercise of his discretion" do this thing. I do not think the President would regard it as mandatory. I believe he would look to the record. He would have the record before him, as the Committee on Military Affairs had it. He would have it as the Congress of the United States in this Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar has it. Let me refer to the language of the bill as I have it in my hand: "And the President can, if he shall desire, in the exercise of his own discretion appoint." I undertake to say I shall not respect the President as highly as I do if he regards that as a command on the part of the American Congress to appoint this gentleman to a place in the Army.

Mr. McCOOK. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman; but go on and finish your sentence.

Mr. BROWNE. Very well; I will finish my sentence. I say this, and then I will yield to the gentleman from New York: If the officers of the regular Army are as careful to advise the President of his duty in this regard as they have been to inform the Committee on Military Affairs, then there can be no doubt the President will understand the whole history of this case before he exercises his discretion upon the bill. He will not be allowed to grant this commission until these gentlemen who have an interest in keeping improper persons out of the Army have been fully heard.

Now, I will hear the gentleman from New York, [Mr. McCOOK.]

Mr. McCOOK. I concede, Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman says in one respect is true; but I wish simply to appeal to his knowledge in cases of a similar character, whether previous Presidents have not considered the action by Congress under a bill of this character as mandatory or directory to him, and whether, therefore, without consulting the proper officers, he has not acted upon the theory it was the duty of Congress to investigate the matter and not throw the responsibility upon him, even when the phraseology of the bill is as it is in this case? Now, in the case of Captain Armes——

Mr. BROWNE. I thought the gentleman from New York rose to ask me a question.

Mr. McCOOK. Yes, and I have asked it.

Mr. BROWNE. I do not know what the precedents are in this respect, but I will say frankly to the gentleman from New York that I do not believe the President of the United States has ever had presented to him a bill so guarded in its language as the one now under consideration.

Mr. McCOOK. The Armes bill was, I think, of a like character.

Mr. BROWNE. I do not remember in my short experience on the Committee on Military Affairs to have seen a bill, among the numerous ones before it, so guarded as this.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Will you accept as an amendment to that bill, at the bottom, declaratory that Congress does not by the passage of this act intend to express any opinion to the President as to the propriety of making the appointment?

Mr. BROWNE. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I have not control of the bill. I am not even a member of the committee reporting it to the House. I will say to him, however, were it my bill I should not object to the amendment he suggests. But that is simply my own view on that subject.

When I was interrupted by the gentleman from New York, or rather when he made his speech and propounded an interrogatory, I had about closed what I had to say on this branch of the subject; that the bill is guarded; that when it goes to the President it will go with the record, it will go with his advisers, and the whole question will confront him. All the Congress of the United States does is in saying to him that if on examination of this gallant officer's record, beginning at the very beginning of the war and going all through it, he thinks he ought to be appointed a captain, then it is the opinion of Congress he may do it, notwithstanding the action of the court-martial. That is all there is on that point.

Now, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes.

Mr. BROWNE. I cannot get through in that time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will take the floor at the close of your three minutes, and then yield you a portion of my time.

Mr. BROWNE. Very well; I will proceed. There is a single question further to be considered. Suppose this record is as fearfully against General Kirby as my distinguished colleague seeks to make it, suppose it is all that. Here is an unfortunate passage in the man's life, put it stronger than that and say that on the 11th day of June in one year he committed acts disgracing his manhood. Put it that strong if you will. But who has not erred, who has not fallen? Do you know how strongly he combatted the temptation? Do you know the circumstances under which the hour of weakness came? Do you know it, gentlemen? Do you intend to allow this one act in this man's life to blast his whole future and obscure his gallant record in the past? I had the honor to serve for a short time with the Army that went to the rescue of the republican institutions, and I know how often the most gallant, the most heroic, those upon whom you would rely when the hour of danger came, the men you would send down to the mouths of the cannon, the men you would put in the forefront of battle when you would charge the intrenchments—I know now often these gallant men have yielded to the temptation of strong drink.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BROWNE. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. Now, what is this man's record? Does it justify what I have said about him? At the first tap of the drum, when the bugle first sounded the alarm in that border State of Missouri, surrounded as he was by the discontented and disloyal, he was among the very first to respond to the call of his country. Among the very first—I repeat it. He did not hesitate about it. He tendered his services to the country and to the flag, and soon after he became a member of the staff of the gallant Frank Blair. And, Mr. Chairman, he did not go on parade duty; he did not perform simply in masquerade with epaulets and gauntlets and top-boots; he did not engage in that service which relieves men of responsibility, but during the whole of his service—the whole of it, I measure my words—during the whole of that most dangerous service he was in the field. He never faltered; he never flinched; he never skulked. I am speaking, sir, of what the record in the War Office shows and what the certificates of such distinguished captains as Grant, Logan, Howard, and Morgan L. Smith and others show. During this service, according to the statement of General Grant, he was four times wounded. That is perhaps a mistake of one, but he was at least three times wounded in battle. More than that: the record of that officer will show what the records of few officers in the volunteer or regular Army, I venture to affirm, can show—that he was three times brevetted.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for another question?

Mr. BROWNE. To be sure, sir.

Mr. BRAGG. How can it be said that Kirby was driven from the Army by any illegal or improper motive, or without sufficient cause, when the great commander who has certified to that record of which you speak himself approved the finding? Must it not have been a strong case against him to destroy that friendship?

Mr. BROWNE. The gentleman argues upon an assumption of fact that may not appear in the case. I happen to know, and I have no doubt the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin knows it as well, that these cases are reviewed at the War Department and signed simply by the officer of that Department. And I happen to know that these cases are presented for the signature of the Secretary of War; and when they receive the signature of the President they are presented as a mere matter of form and are signed as matters of form. They are brought in by clerks, who point out where the signature is to go, and there it goes. And I do not blame them. It is a well-known fact that it would be practically impossible for the heads of Departments to review the records and testimony in every case that comes before them, and at the same time discharge the multifarious duties devolving upon them. They are compelled to rely, and do rely except in extreme cases, upon their subordinates.

Mr. McCOOK. If the heads of Departments cannot review these cases, how can the President review this case?

Mr. BROWNE. That question is not exactly pertinent. It is not, however, impertinent. I say I appeal to the common sense and intelligence of members of this House if it must not be, in the very nature of things, that these records and proceedings cannot in all cases be reviewed by the Secretary of War himself. It must necessarily be done by clerks. But in this case, I will answer the gentleman from Wisconsin, that I do not know that General Grant ever saw the record. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin state that he did? I put the question directly. The gentleman is silent. I do not know that he did not see it. He may have read it. I do not know that he did. I cannot say that he did not. I do not care if he read it a hundred times. I am stating facts that are facts of record. I was proceeding to say that General Kirby had been three times brevetted for gallant services, not generally, but for special service. We were all brevetted generals.

But there were cases where this officer was brevetted three times for gallantry and bravery in the service in particular cases. Now let me ask you, it is a plain question, can the Government of the United States well dispense with the services of men who have been so conspicuous for gallantry? You gentlemen who profess to admire the volunteer soldier so much, you who gush so gushingly when questions come before us that affect the interests of the Army, let me ask you what a compliment you pay the service when you propose to strike down irrevocably a man who during his whole life in the Army, covering a period of five or six years, has been guilty of a single fault, a single crime, if you please to call it so?

If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, I will repeat an anecdote he told me a few minutes ago about an old colonel of the war of 1812, Colonel Cromb, who served with distinction under Jackson during that war and continued in the Army subsequently and after Jackson had become President of the United States. Some of the officers came to the President and said, "Colonel Cromb gets drunk, disgracefully drunk; why, it was only last week he went staggering along the streets; he is bringing the Army into disrepute." A day or two afterward even worse things than that were said about him as to his conduct at a dinner party, and the officers said, "Mr. President, he must be removed for the sake of the Army." The old hero of New Orleans looked at these gentlemen and said, "Old Colonel Cromb, by his gallantry at the siege of Sandusky, earned the right to be drunk all the balance of his life and, by the Eternal, he has my permission to be so." [Laughter.]

I say it ought to be possible in this Republic, when we call upon our people for exhibitions of self-sacrifice and personal heroism, it ought to be possible for a man by his gallant and heroic conduct to at least wipe out an indiscretion of his life. If the Republic is to be so heartless—I repeat it—so heartless as to put the ban upon one of its most distinguished and gallant officers because he got drunk on a single occasion and committed indiscretions, little or big, then the drum may beat and the bugles blow and still a good many people hereafter will decline to enter its military service.

I congratulate the committee and the friends of the bill on the fact that the same bill has just been favorably considered by the Senate and is now on our table awaiting our action.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. I have no knowledge of this case further than I have gained in its presentation in the House, and I have been interested because I happened to be of the volunteer army and felt an interest that justice should be done to a heroic volunteer officer, and at the same time that in any action that Congress took the honor of the old volunteer army should be maintained.

The legality of the court which tried this officer has been impeached and the course of its proceedings made to appear ridiculous. But, sir, it has left a monument that has not yet been overthrown or assailed sufficiently to satisfy me that justice demands of this Congress the passage of this bill for the benefit of my heroic brother volunteer officer. That monument is the evidence.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] says he admits this officer was drunk and that when drunk he took money and expended it, and if I correctly apprehended him it appeared from the letter read by the honorable gentleman from Indiana that for ten or twelve days this gallant and heroic officer was drunk more or less. That is the impression I derived from what I heard.

Now, this court-martial, illegal and irregular and ridiculous as it has been stated to be, has brought up the evidence that he was guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. If he was, I say the honor of the old volunteer army demands that this Congress maintain the judgment of that court; and there is nothing that appeals to my sense of justice to my brother volunteer officers to take this man up by the action of Congress and intimate to the President that he ought to be put back to his place in the Army over two hundred faithful men standing without opportunity of promotion, with our Army paralyzed because these men cannot get up. If the strength of the Army consists in the opportunity presented for promotion and these men have stood there and are entitled to it, I think a very good case ought to be made out for such a bill as this having such an effect before it should be passed in the name of justice to a gallant officer.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not intend to occupy the attention of the committee more than a few moments. But in view of what has been said by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. DAWES,] who has just taken his seat, I desire to call the attention of the committee briefly to some of the testimony in this case.

Mr. President, I do not know General Kirby personally. I never saw him or met him until this matter was before the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration. When this bill and report were being considered by the Committee on Military Affairs I determined to examine the testimony, voluminous as it is, and have examined it from the beginning to the end. I think I can say here with entire truth that I have read every word of the proceedings before the court-martial which tried General Kirby, and I corroborate most of what my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has said here in regard to the proceedings of that court.

I say, in the first place, after this court was organized and for several days had proceeded to hear the testimony which was offered against General Kirby the judge-advocate seems to have taken it into his head that the president of the court, General Mower, was prejudiced in favor of General Kirby, and thereupon he raised the question as to his competency to try the case; and as the gentleman from Indiana has said, for nine days they proceeded, not to try General Kirby, but to try the president, the very head of the court; and after reading the testimony of every witness who testified in that regard, as a lawyer, I say without hesitation, having had some experience in judging of evidence in such cases, that in my opinion the testimony against General Mower would not have excused him from serving on any jury in any respectable court in the country; but if the prosecution had wanted to get rid of him they would have been compelled to exhaust a peremptory challenge, for there was nothing, in my judgment, to justify even a suspicion that General Mower would not have tried that case honorably and fairly, and that he would not have been governed by the testimony in determining the guilt or innocence of the accused. So much for that.

Now, my friend and colleague on the committee [Mr. STEELE] says that these men were volunteers.

Mr. STEELE. Five of the seven were.

Mr. HENDERSON. Five of the seven were volunteers. I do not doubt that, and I do not doubt but they were very green volunteers, too. They certainly had had no experience as members of a court-martial, for while they were trying a man upon the charge of being drunk for several days in succession, they absolutely refused to allow the only persons who were with him, and knew what his condition was, to testify as to his being sick, because, forsooth, they were not doctors and were not experts.

There were two witnesses who were not allowed to testify on that point, because they were not experts. The court was cleared for the purpose of considering the objections to the testimony of a witness who swore that he had been a nurse in a hospital; that he was experienced in cases of sickness; that he had had experience in cases of fever. Yet that witness was not allowed to testify to the fact that General Kirby was sick during the time these men charged him with being drunk.

Now, I want to say in regard to the charge of drunkenness, that I do not believe the charge of drunkenness is sufficiently made out against General Kirby at the time spoken of, and I would like to call the attention of this committee for a moment to the proceedings in that court. The second specification of the first charge reads as follows:

In this: that he, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel D. T. Kirby, captain Thirty-ninth Infantry, commanding the post of Fort Pike, did challenge one J. L. Duval, a civilian engineer in the Quartermaster's Department, to a pugilistic encounter, designating the wharf at Fort Pike as the rendezvous; and upon the failure of said Duval to meet him at the place specified, did return and say to the aforementioned Duval, "You are a damned coward."

Now the court find the defendant guilty on that specification after striking out these words:

Challenge one J. L. Duval, a civilian engineer in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department, to a pugilistic encounter, designating the wharf at Fort Pike as the rendezvous, and upon the failure of said Duval to meet him at the place specified, did return and say to the aforementioned Duval, "You are a damned coward."

They struck out all these words, and found him not guilty of that part of the specification. And why? Two witnesses swore positively to that, and they are witnesses upon whose testimony this man was convicted. These two witnesses swear to that state of facts; but the court did not find it true.

Why did not the court find it true on their testimony? Because this man Duval himself did not swear to any such state of facts. He simply swore that Colonel Kirby came into his room and complained. Colonel Kirby had sent a message to him in the first place, and he did not pay any attention to it, but said he did not understand it. Then Colonel Kirby went into his room and complained of this man Duval making a noise, not because he was drunk, but, as I believe, because he was sick. And I say that the testimony overwhelmingly shows that he was sick at that time and not drunk.

Now, this man Duval did not swear to that state of facts, but said that Colonel Kirby came in his room, and he told him that he did not understand his message; that Colonel Kirby complained of there being too much noise in the engine-room, and thereupon they got into some little altercation, and finally Colonel Kirby did say to him—not "you are a damned coward"—for when requested by the court to state the exact language used by Colonel Kirby, Duval said that it was, "You are a coward," leaving out the word "damned." Then Duval said to Colonel Kirby, "Are you armed?" and Kirby replied, "I am;" and then committed one of the most serious offenses, in my judgment, that was charged against him. He used a vulgar saying, which would have been used perhaps by a great many men as good as any who served on that court, under like circumstances.

That was the testimony in regard to Colonel Kirby being drunk on the 11th day of June. This man Duval did not justify the sworn statement of the other witnesses who did swear that Kirby challenged Duval to go to the wharf and fight, and therefore the court struck out that part of the specification.

Now, what is the evidence in regard to his being on a drunken spree from the 11th to the 17th of June? One colored man comes in and swears that he got liquor from day to day; that he got quart bottles of brandy and quart bottles of whisky; and during these six days he got in all about a dozen quart bottles of whisky and brandy.

Now, if any one should believe that statement he would be very likely to believe that Colonel Kirby was on a drunken debauch at that time. But let me tell you, gentlemen, what the testimony is. The colored man swears in his testimony that he bought this liquor from the sutler. He said that he did not have any money to pay for it, because the Colonel did not send any money, and therefore it was charged on the books of the sutler.

When the sutler is brought in to give his testimony, he swears he did not keep any brandy at all; that he kept a little whisky, but none in quart bottles; that while he knew nothing of the quantity of liquor that was obtained, he found upon his books (the very best evidence in the world) that there had been charged to General Kirby during the six days from the 12th to the 17th, inclusive, three or four pint bottles of whisky.

Mr. BRAGG. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. Was not that sutler an appointee of Kirby—the sutler of his post, holding his place dependent upon Kirby's will?

Mr. HENDERSON. There is no question about the correctness of Mr. Carroll's testimony. He swears that he did not sell any liquor himself, but that his clerk did; that it was charged upon the books and there were only three or four bottles charged.

Mr. BROWNE. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] to assent to the proposition of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG?]

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. BROWNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether he is prepared to say that it is not true.

Mr. BRAGG. If I should take the floor to speak upon this bill, it will afford me the greatest pleasure to give any information that I may possess to my benighted friend from Indiana.

Mr. BROWNE. I supposed the gentleman would decline to answer.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the sutler is called before this court, not by Colonel Kirby at all; he does not appear there as Colonel Kirby's witness, but as a witness for the prosecution; and he does not testify to having sold any liquor himself, but says that his clerk did so, because he found it charged upon the books; that he had looked over his books to find just what was charged upon the books against Colonel Kirby at that time.

Now, let me go further and say to my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] my colleague upon the committee, for whose opinion I have a great deal of respect, that there are other witnesses who testify to being with General Kirby during those days; that the witnesses who testify to his being on a drunken debauch testify, some of them, that they did not see him more than once or twice during the whole time. None of them, except one or two, saw him out of his quarters, and others did not see him at all during the time. He was confined to his room nearly all this time, and there were not only witnesses who were in the room waiting upon him and who knew his condition but the wives of officers were waiting upon him. I say, therefore, that the whole testimony as to the charge of drunkenness against Colonel Kirby at that time is to my mind of a flimsy and unsatisfactory character; and I say this after reading every word of evidence that was produced on the trial.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another charge, and a very serious charge, was that of insulting the wife of an officer. But I do not think that any member who has examined this matter carefully has ever given a great deal of weight to that charge. It is manifest, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BROWNE,] that this lady told an entirely different story when she first came out of that room from that she afterward attested to. To explain this discrepancy what testimony was offered? Her husband comes forward and says that she did not tell all to Mrs. Hanson, because he signaled to her not to tell it. How did he know that she was stating what had occurred in the room? How did he know but that she was telling the whole of it? But Mrs. McGitzky (if that is the name of the lady who is alleged to have been insulted) gives in her testimony a reason so ridiculous as to make an entire farce of the whole thing. She admits that she did not tell the wife of Lieutenant Hanson any more than Mrs. Hanson testified she said; but to explain this she says, "I did not tell her, because I did not want it published all over the camp." Therefore you must infer that she did want it published over the Fort that this officer had attempted to kiss her or had wanted to kiss her. She says, "I did not tell it all because I did not want it published to the whole Fort."

But I do not believe that any such insult as is stated was offered by Colonel Kirby to the wife of this officer. The testimony of witnesses in this case, who were in the room with General Kirby and had the best opportunity of knowing, shows that during the period from the 11th to the 17th of June, when Colonel Kirby was confined to his quarters, he drank but very little whisky, and that in connection with medicine, which he was taking at the time; that he was in fact sick. I think the testimony is overwhelming that he was sick, and not on a drunken debauch.

I say that at most the testimony, taking it to be true as stated, would only show that on the 11th of June he was under the influence of liquor; but after that there is no testimony which would satisfy, it seems to me, any reasonable mind weighing it with candor and fairness that he was under the influence of liquor, much less drunk.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say in regard to the character of Colonel Kirby outside of this case, for I know nothing about it, except it appears he was a brave and gallant officer who served with exceptional distinction and with exceptional bravery during the late war. I will say what has been said before that I, for one, am not prepared to do this officer the injustice to strike him down at one blow and rob him of his distinction and honor so fairly won on account of one or two indiscretions, and which from all the testimony in the case I am satisfied are not of so serious a character as to justify any such punishment as has been inflicted upon General Kirby.

It may be said the surgeon of the regiment testified he was under the influence of liquor and suffering from delirium tremens.

Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible for me to believe from the testimony produced in this case before the court-martial that the statement made by the surgeon was or could possibly be true. Because if it were true the wife of Lieutenant Hanson perjures herself when she says he was suffering, and his head was hot, and he was feverish, and she was administering to his wants. She would not have been there, and the officer would not have sent the wife who complained of his rudeness if he had been in a drunken debauch instead of being sick, and in fact the officer said in effect, "Colonel Kirby is sick and it is proper you should go to see him." There is not the slightest testimony except the naked statement of the surgeon, who did not see him during all that time until on the 17th of June, for saying he was so much under the influence of liquor as to be suffering from delirium tremens. I believe the character of Colonel Kirby, so far as these proceedings of the court-martial are concerned, stands fair with the exception, if you please, that he was guilty of one or two indiscretions in regard to using too much liquor, but I do not believe it just on our part, as I said before, to strike down a brave and gallant man and rob him of his glorious record, dismiss him, cashier him, send him out of the Army in disgrace, as we would do if we justify the proceedings of this court-martial, for what at most amounts, in my opinion, to an indiscretion on the part of General Kirby. If that be Army justice I do not want any of it.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I have had no opportunity to re-examine the evidence in this case since it was presented to the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-fifth Congress. I remember distinctly the impressions which were then made upon my mind, and as I have listened to this debate I must say those impressions have grown into conviction that it would be an outrage upon the Army of the United States for the Congress to reinstate a man who was dismissed fourteen years ago from the service.

It is quite common for us, and perhaps as much for your speaker as for any one else, to speak at times derisively or jeeringly of the Army. My course since I have been in Congress has been such I cannot be accused of over-prejudice in their favor or proceedings. But, sir, we must all concede the highest wish either or any of us should ever intend should be that the Army at all times, and all officers composing it, should be gentlemen of honor, gentlemen of character, gentlemen of integrity—an organization in which we should all have a natural pride.

How are we to encourage such an organization? How are we to weed out the worthless elements which, through political influence, find their way inside the Army, and are given commissions and command until it has been said, oftentimes, that before the war the button of the Army gave one entrée everywhere into society, for it was a voucher its wearer was a gentleman of character; and too often since it has failed to carry with it the impression which originally accompanied its presence. The discipline of the Army is the first thing that is essential to the making of it such a body as we desire.

How can we discipline it if the Congress of the United States are continually interfering with its discipline? How can the officers of the Army be responsible for its control if men who are driven from the Army by the judgment of a court, can come about the Legislature and year after year whisper their complaints to members of Congress who have no responsibility of the discipline of the Army until they enlist one for political reasons, enlist another for State reasons, and enlist another because, perhaps, the party who had been discharged from the Army had been a volunteer and they appealed to volunteer officers to stand up and prevent an oppression which the regular Army proposed to put upon them. These are the different species of arguments which are plied, first the one and then the other, just as they may become applicable, until if the Army has become an Army without proper discipline, if it does contain officers who are not what they should be, the Congress of the United States is responsible for it, and not the officers of the Army who have its discipline in charge.

Why should this man go back to the Army? I make no reflection upon his bravery; I know him but scarcely. I am willing to concede that he was as brave as Ney, that he carried the lance at the front wherever he went. But conceding that, I must call attention to what the experience of all of us is, that, no matter how brave he may have been, when he enters into a contest with "Old Alcohol" he is sure to be routed in the battle. [Laughter.]

Let us see. Mr. Kirby was appointed in the volunteer service. He discharged his duties properly, gallantly, and well, and received the commendation of his superior officer. The war closed June 30, 1866. In 1868 he was dismissed the service of the United States, a young man, not having yet been sufficiently long in the military service to acquire those habits which interfere with the ordinary engagements of life to which other volunteer officers returned upon leaving the service. He had seen but three years' service—a little less in the regular Army. So when he came out of the Army he came out in the very vigor of life; and with all the habits of business that a man with such a glorious record and such great ability as Kirby is represented to possess, it would seem that he must necessarily have turned his attention to some other calling, which he would have pursued, and pursued successfully. Instead of that, what has he done? Rested idly upon his oars, waiting for some favoring breeze that would waft him back again into a position where the Government would support him.

That has been his record; and I say that he has no right to ask of us that we shall confer any such favor upon him. Fourteen years he has been absent from the Army. Fourteen years his fellows in the Army have been struggling upon the frontier, some in one branch of the service, some in another, all undergoing the hardships and privations of frontier campaigns; while he, whose campaigning has been limited to the corridors of Washington and about these streets, lobbying for a commission at the hands of Congress, shall be permitted to go back and be placed in a position above all those men who for that long period have been carrying on the Indian campaigns upon the frontier. Is that justice? Is it right?

So, Mr. Chairman, I have thus far stated my objections to this bill: first, that it is fatal to the discipline of the Army; second, that this officer, by reason of length of service, has no right to ask to be placed upon the list of Army officers on account of long service; and third, that it operates not only to the discouragement but to the disadvantage of those officers who have remained in the line, and who have been doing their duty, while he has been doing no duty at all. And now, Mr. Chairman, I will allude, for a moment, to the grounds that are assigned for this proposed action. What are they? First, we have certain certificates read, all of which are dated since the close of the war and when he was an applicant for appointment by his old commander. Is it not a fact, within the knowledge of every member of this committee within the sound of my voice, that it is notoriously easy to sign certificates and give testimonials and write commendations for a clever fellow, when you can thereby relieve yourself of a great deal of good, hard pleading upon his part and when you know full well that they will have but little weight in promoting his object.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKS. Does the gentleman think it would be easy, if the facts alleged in these commendations were not true, to obtain letters of the character I have read from such men as General Sherman, General Howard, General Frank P. Blair, General Logan, and all of those men who certify to these pre-eminent qualities of this man? I ask him if the letters state what is not true does he believe that it would have been possible for this man to have obtained them?

Mr. BRAGG. I will answer my colleague by saying that it is a long time since I have read Mrs. Opie on Lying; but I believe that in addition to her "white lies" and "black lies," there is latterly what we might class as diplomatic lies. They are not considered lies in the sense that we would class the black lies of Mrs. Opie. They belong to that character of diplomatic evasions necessarily resorted to by gentlemen in order to rid themselves of the persistent boring of men who insist upon having something or other to show what they are worth. And I say this, that I believe such letters are written in self-protection, because it has become a well-established fact that every man who writes one of them or signs it signs it with the understanding that if he is called upon to explain why he did it, he is privileged and very apt to say, I knew it would produce no effect at all; it does not mean anything; it required my personal presence to produce the effect which was desired, and the Department knows it.

The reason why this officer should now be restored, and placed over the heads of his comrades who remained in the service, is that the court-martial were irregular in some of their proceedings; and my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has cited the manner of charging the jury and the manner of trying causes in civil courts for the purpose of showing the irregularity; while my distinguished friend from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] late chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, has alluded to the fact that the court consisted of only five members.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRAGG. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it proposed here to pay this man back pay?

Mr. SPARKS. On the contrary, the bill specially excludes that.

Mr. BRAGG. That is left for the next bill. It is true this bill specially excludes it. But I may say that this morning I was obliged to ask permission to present a minority report against paying four years of back pay recommended in a bill reported by the same Military Committee who report this bill, where it had been excluded precisely as it is in this bill. So that we see these clauses of exclusion amount to very little when the pressure gets sufficiently strong to break away the barriers which we are able to throw around us for a little while, until, succumbing to the constant attacks in our committee-room and at our lodgings, we get in despair and say, "You and the Government may go to the devil rather than bother me any longer."

By an article of war regulating the numbers constituting a court-martial the number fixed is thirteen for the maximum and ten for the minimum. Where a lesser number than thirteen constitutes the court the order which appoints the court uses the formal phrase that no greater number can be summoned without manifest injury to the service. The practice of courts-martial and of the Government and of military law is that at any time during the trial the officer summoning the court may relieve any member of that court or any number of members of the court, provided that that court be not reduced below the minimum. But if a member be relieved which shall reduce it below the minimum, that is in effect an order dissolving the court, and in lieu of that generally an order of dissolution of the court is issued. That answers the objection that the testimony for five days had been taken when one man was upon the court who became sick and was relieved. It answers the other objection that the president of the court was subsequently relieved from duty upon the court. For there still remained five who were competent under the Articles of War to try and determine the case.

But I will concede that the proceedings in this challenging of the president of the court were irregular. I can well see, however, a case where such irregularity would be extremely and highly praiseworthy. The court, after it had proceeded for eight or nine days—no matter how many; the number does not now present itself to my mind—found that in their judgment the president was prejudiced and incompetent to sit upon the court. Thereupon they closed their doors and proceeded to settle that question in their own minds, excluding the outside world from their deliberations, and taking testimony to determine the question whether he had prejudged that case or not. That action in no wise prejudiced the rights of Mr. Kirby, for his case was not then under consideration, and the action of that court in considering the qualifications of the president of the court are not now here subjects of discussion. After having satisfied themselves, whether upon competent evidence or no, that he was not an impartial judge, they decided that he should no longer take part in their deliberations, evidently for the purpose of expressing the declaration of the court as to his incompetency and unfitness with a view of making application to the department commander to the end that he might be legally relieved from duty upon that court.

While the qualifications of the president of the court were under consideration, no testimony bearing upon Colonel Kirby was taken at all; and before any proceeding was taken in which Colonel Kirby had any interest an order came from the department commander relieving the president of that court from duty upon the court. So that in law, so far as Colonel Kirby is concerned, the court took a recess from the time that it ceased to consider his case until the court was reorganized again, after it had been relieved of its president by reason of their finding him not impartial, he himself asking to be relieved as is the military way of decently getting out of the thing. The court then resumed the case precisely where they left it.

After the court again assembled and proceeded to try Colonel Kirby it had the requisite number. It proceeded to judgment. That judgment was approved and the sentence has been fourteen years executed.

The charges which were preferred against him and upon which he was dismissed the service were those of drunkenness. Whether the charges were true or not I am not able, of course, positively to state; but I place myself precisely in the attitude of an appellate court in reviewing the decision of the court at nisi prius that heard the witnesses. The court that heard the witnesses, that saw their appearance, the manner of the giving of their testimony, that saw all those little things that indicated whether they were telling the truth or not, found that the witnesses told the truth. There was conflicting evidence upon both sides. Colonel Kirby proved, of course, to a certain degree by a waiting maid or a nurse that he was sick; not drunk, but sick. The court found that he was drunk. They found it upon the testimony of the surgeon, who was the most competent witness certainly at that post to determine whether Colonel Kirby was suffering under mania a potu or delirum tremens under any form whatever.

I do not feel called upon here, fourteen years after that trial, to review the evidence and say the court found improperly. On the contrary, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that as an invariable rule every officer in the Army, who by any indiscretion may do that which might bring him to grief were complaints made upon the subject, is carefully covered and shielded by his fellows until the evil becomes so great that it may no longer be concealed; and then comes the charge in as mild a form as possible to vindicate the honor of the Army and of the soldiers who are in association with the one who is charged with being derelict.

I do not believe, except it may be in the rarest of instances, that any one Army officer is so prejudiced against another of his fellows as to do him an injustice by finding him guilty of a grave offense, a breach not only of military law, but a breach of ordinary decency and civility.

I know it is urged that Colonel Kirby was sick. I know he called his sutler to prove that he did not drink very much. I do not think you can prove anything against an officer by his sutler. A sutler would not be apt to testify against one of his good customers if there was danger of losing him. I do not lay any great stress upon that evidence.

In regard to the sickness of this officer and his being occasionally drunk, I am reminded of a friend of mine who served with me in the Army, and who is now quite a distinguished lawyer in the Northwest. By the way, he has fallen into Republican habits, and they are very bad habits. His face has grown very red, and his breath smells very strong. [Laughter.] He delivers temperance lectures periodically, and he occasionally goes to a revival and gets a new spirit of grace to preserve his standing among his fellows. Now, when he is taken to task for the redness of his face and the strength of his breath, he says he does not drink because he delivers temperance lectures. But if you will go into the back room of his office from time to time you will see piled up there in stacks bottles of Hostetter's Bitters [laughter] that are taken by him simply to restore his appetite and to put his stomach in good condition for a meal.

Mr. SPARKS. He lives in Wisconsin?

Mr. BRAGG. I think he was reared in Illinois.

Mr. SPARKS. But he lives in Wisconsin now.

Mr. BRAGG. He moved to Wisconsin to see if he could break away from some of his evil habits. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. Many of that class of our citizens have moved up there.

Mr. BRAGG. Now, I think that when the court found—and the evidence is unquestionable—that the commanding officer of the post—mind you, when you are considering the matter of discipline you are not considering the discipline of some poor lieutenant of an officer in his quarters, but the commanding officer of his post, the model of discipline, the one who lays down the law and executes it to enforce the discipline of his post—when you find him reeling at dress-parade in front of his command, and unable to discharge his duty, and going into his quarters and sending for a woman to feel of his pulse and see if he is not sick, it is time the Army should be relieved from that kind of officers if we desire to preserve any discipline in that corps of the service, or to preserve the respect of the American people toward it.

Mr. CLARDY. I shall detain the Committee of the Whole but a moment.

Mr. BRAGG. If the gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. CLARDY. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. I omitted to allude to one thing which, by the courtesy of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CLARDY,] I desire to call to the attention of this committee.

It is urged by the friends of this bill that its language is such that the President need not appoint this man unless he chooses. I desire members of this committee to remember that Congress cannot pass any law to compel the President to appoint anybody. The appointing power rests in the President, and in him only.

The rule of the Department, however, is that if Congress, by the passage of a bill through both branches, shall indicate a desire to secure a particular appointment, it will be considered as directory upon the President that the appointment be made. Such has always been the case; such it always will be.

In one instance, since I have been a member of Congress, a most objectionable officer was restored to the Army, one who was known to have the General of the Army and all the staff about the Army headquarters and the War Department bitterly opposed to his restoration, for he had been court-martialed once, twice, or three times already. By the insertion of such ingenious clauses in a bill they were able to lull into security my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MCCOOK,] so that he voted for the bill, trusting that the President would not regard it as a direction. And in less than ten days afterward that man was riding in a carriage and sporting a major's shoulder-straps. The sequel was what? Twice since then that officer has been cashiered and dismissed the service for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman; and twice has he been sustained by Congressional influence, so that he now remains in the Army.

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] will allow me a moment. In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] that this bill if passed will be regarded as mandatory upon the President, I simply want to read from the bill:

> And the President can, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint, &c.

I say that no bill that I remember, no bill to my knowledge, has ever been brought into this House for passage containing such words as these. Hence any precedent that the gentleman may allude to here does not apply to this bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I will inquire of the gentleman, my colleague on the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. SPARKS,] if he was a member of that committee in the Forty-fifth Congress?

Mr. SPARKS. A member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-fifth Congress?

Mr. BRAGG. Of the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. SPARKS. I was a member of the House of the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. BRAGG. But you were a member of the Committee on Appropriations and not of the Committee on Military Affairs of that Congress.

Mr. SPARKS. I was not a member of that committee in the Forty-fifth Congress, but was a member of the House; and I state again that no bill so broad as this was ever introduced here for the action of the House to my knowledge, using the language, "the President can, if he so desire, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate," &c., and I repeat that in my judgment it is not mandatory on the President.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the President of the United States cannot without the action of Congress do just what is asked in behalf of this officer?

Mr. SPARKS. No, sir. Here is this stain upon his character, this judgment of dismissal from the Army—a judgment which, as the gentleman from Wisconsin says, is some thirteen years old, and I might add, if the gentleman from Wisconsin and other gentlemen will persist in beating off this brave soldier for thirteen years longer, it will then be twenty-six years old. Ever since that farce of a court-martial removed General Kirby he has been demanding justice of the country that he served and helped to save. Unlike many other officers who now have fat places, he bears upon his body the marks of four wounds received in battle, and he had three horses shot under him. That, I think, is a sufficient answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who seems afraid that his restoration will prejudice some officer now in the service. It has indeed been thirteen years since the rendition of the judgment of that iniquitous court-martial; but during all these thirteen years General Kirby has been struggling against "the law's delays," and has been constantly demanding of his country the justice that is due him by undoing the monstrous wrongs which that farcical proceeding inflicted upon him.

Mr. CLARDY. I shall detain the committee but a moment, and I should have said nothing but for some remarks which fell from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] in relation to the procurement of the testimonials accompanying this report. I represent a people among whom Colonel Kirby lived in 1861.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to read an act for the information of my military friend from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS?]

Mr. CLARDY. I yield for a moment.

Mr. BRAGG. In chapter 64 of the laws of 1878 will be found the act to which I referred:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of law regulating appointments in the Army by promotion in the line are hereby suspended for the purposes of this act, and only so far as they affect George A. Armes.

That is similar to this bill.

And the President can, if he so desires, in the exercise of his own discretion and judgment, nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint, &c.

Mr. SPARKS. That is a case precisely in point.

Mr. BRAGG. Exactly.

Mr. SPARKS. I stated that I had never seen one with wording just like this case. It seems there is one. Now I say in that case, as in this, that that language is not mandatory. The gentleman's point is that it is mandatory.

Mr. BRAGG. Oh, no.

Mr. SPARKS. Did the President regard the act as mandatory in that case?

Mr. BRAGG. He said so.

Mr. SPARKS. In the particular case which you have just read?

Mr. BRAGG. In that particular case.

Mr. SPARKS. Well, sir, I want some proof of that. The gentleman must get some evidence on it; I cannot take mere statement, I say the act is not mandatory, and on that we join our issue.

Mr. CLARDY. I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that I represent the people among whom Colonel Kirby lived in 1861 when he recruited his company and entered the service of the United States; a people who knew him long years before and have known him ever since; a people who appreciate his worth as a citizen and feel a just pride in his brilliant record as a soldier. I am glad, in response to the gentleman from Wisconsin, to testify to their belief in his entire innocence of the offenses for which he was tried. I am glad I can say that their faith in his probity and integrity afforded by the testimony of years has not been affected by the findings of this military court. Nor do I believe, Mr. Chairman, that any fair-minded man can examine the testimony in this case without feeling that every hour which passes over the existence of this unreformed abuse of power upon the part of that court-martial is an hour to be regretted.

The gentleman from Wisconsin concedes that the action of the court in turning aside from the consideration of the main question to an examination as to whether a certain member of the court which had been trying him for six days had not a mental bias in his favor, was a little out of the way, a little irregular. But although it be true as stated by that gentleman that the minimum number by which a man may be tried in a military court is five, and the maximum number thirteen, I say the authorities go to the extent of holding that when a trial is entered upon the accused is entitled to the judgment of every man upon that court as to his guilt or his innocence. In this case, after an examination, as I have said, for six days, five members of the court undertook to determine the question of Major-General Joseph A. Mower's prejudice in favor of the accused; and they dertermined—perhaps from his rulings or from the expression of his countenance pending the trial—that on its conclusion he would vote for acquittal, and by reason of his position as president of the court would influence other members to do likewise.

That judge-advocate, whose whole record in this case is replete with the grossest irregularities, who seems to have determined from the very outset to secure, at whatever cost, the conviction of Colonel Kirby, seeks to displace the president of the court, whom he believes to entertain a feeling friendly to the accused, and actually succeeds in removing him, thus serving notice upon the other members of the court that they must convict. They do, at the dictation of that judge-advocate, convict this man; but his sentence of conviction, as has already been stated, was not approved by the military commander. It was not indorsed by him. On the contrary, he disapproved it. But it was approved when it reached the city of Washington, as we know it is habitual such findings should be approved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is all I have to say. I simply wanted to refer to the testimonials mentioned by my friend from Wisconsin, which I did in a general way. I know from the letters I have received, I know from the enthusiastic friends he has in my district, they believe for the last thirteen years this man has suffered an outrage and that the time has come when he should be relieved. Take the testimony of James O. Brodhead; take the testimony of John Logan; take the testimony of John Hogan, who is here; take the testimony of James S. Rollins, of Missouri, men who are influenced by nothing except to render to every man that which belongs to him.

I repeat that these testimonials were not only free and were not only expressive of the real feelings of the parties who gave them, but were spontaneous, and thousands from the best citizens of the city of Saint Louis could likewise be procured.

I yield now to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHEELER.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I fully appreciate the sentiment which actuates my colleagues on the committee from Indiana, Wisconsin, and New York, for whom and for whose opinions I have the most profound respect. I fully appreciate their motives; I agree with them, and will always sustain them in their most commendable efforts to elevate the Army and to retain therein those, and only those, who have high character and whose conduct as officers and gentlemen have been such as to make them an honor to the Army. But in determining that question where can we get higher and better evidence than that presented here by General Kirby? Where can you get higher evidence as to who should be in the Army and who would be an honor to the Army than from such distinguished soldiers as General Grant, General Sherman, General Blair, General Price, General Mower, General Logan, General Howard, General Belknap, and General Morgan L. Smith? These men knew the character of General Kirby as a soldier and a citizen. I would say to my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] for whom I have a great regard, that those great men did not tell white lies or diplomatic lies. They were actuated in giving the commendations which were before the committee simply by a desire to do what they believed to be for the good of the service. The committee in considering this subject have done what my friend from Wisconsin has said they ought to do; they sat as an appellate court; they considered the evidence furnished by the War Department, and their sole effort was to do what they believed to be plain, naked justice; and in doing this they determined that the proceedings of the court-martial which tried General Kirby were illegal, null, and void.

The Articles of War say:

General courts-martial may consist of any number of officers from five to thirteen, inclusive, but they shall not consist of less than thirteen when that number can be convened without manifest injury to the service.

The Articles of War also say that the officer who appoints the court is the one who is to determine what number can be convened without manifest injury to the service. In this case the court was reduced to the minimum, not by the officer who convened the court, as intimated by my friend from Wisconsin, but by the junior members of said court; and they did it because, as they say, the president of the court was prejudiced in favor of General Kirby. He may have been prejudiced. He fought with him from Belmont in 1861 to Bentonville in 1865. He had seen General Kirby in battle, and he may have been prejudiced in favor of a man whom he knew was a brave and gallant soldier and a gentleman. Napoleon said, "Too often we allow one act of indiscretion to offset and destroy a life of brilliancy and usefulness." General Mower may have thought Napoleon was right and may have felt that one act of indiscretion on the part of this gallant general should not offset all the brilliancy which he displayed on a hundred fields, and this may have induced General Mower to insist that his comrade in arms by whose side he had so often breasted the storm of battle should at least be granted a fair, legal, and impartial trial. There is one more legal point. The Articles of War say that the officer who appoints a court-martial shall not designate the president, but the senior officer shall be the president. Therefore the officer in ordering a court designates the president in fact by arranging who shall be the senior officer. In this case the junior officers changed the president and substituted for the president one of their own number.

Mr. BRAGG. Pardon me. Did not the General of the Army relieve the President from duty before any action was taken by the court?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think the record shows that such was the case.

Mr. SPARKS. It shows they made their findings after they had turned this man out and so far as they could by their judgment. The commander of the post states in his communication that he relieved General Mower from further service on the board, and he gives as the reason because the board had insulted him.

Mr. WHEELER. One word more. The gentleman from Indiana says this court consisted of five volunteer officers. I would be the last man in this House to say one word reflecting on the volunteer officers of the Army of the United States. I know as well as any man their record of distinguished chivalry. It has given a luster to American arms and American character which justly commands the admiration of the world; but, with all respect to these brave men, and certainly abstaining from the slightest word which would detract from their military prestige, I can say without fear of contradiction from any professional soldier that if that court had been composed of men of military education and training, and who understood military law, this House would never have been called upon to discuss the subject they now have under consideration.

Mr. MCCOOK. I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to say a word in regard to this case, and as members must be weary of the discussion, I will not consume the time of the committee at any great length.

I have listened to this case, not only in this Congress, but in preceding Congresses. I have given it as careful attention as I could. I have examined it before the manuscript of the case was in print, and subsequently, and I have never varied from the belief which I entertained from all the examination I have been able to give to the subject, that Mr. Kirby should not be restored to the rolls of the Army of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] have in my judgment covered this ground so thoroughly and so completely that it is scarcely necessary that I should detain the House with another word. But there are some facts to which I wish briefly to call your attention.

I say nothing in regard to Mr. Kirby's gallantry, nor do I deny that he was a brave and gallant soldier; that he was wounded in the discharge of his duty is unquestioned. As a recognition of that fact he was made an officer in the regular Army of the United States, a position for life or during good behavior; and in my judgment he has forfeited his position by his own acts, as shown by the records of the courts-martial and by all of the facts that have been submitted in the case. Nor need I say anything, for in one sense of the word it is not a matter of consequence in this connection, as to the legal aspect of the construction of that court-martial and the removal of General Mower, the president of the court, before the trial was ended. That question has been introduced here, and has figured largely in connection with the merits of this case.

But, Mr. Chairman, General Mower is not on trial here. The sole question for us to determine is whether Mr. Kirby shall be restored to the rolls of the Army, and that is the only question submitted to this committee. Now, in my judgment, from all of the facts which appear in this case, he is a man who is not entitled to it; and he is not a fit or proper person to be again placed on the rolls of the Army. In addition to the evidence, in my opinion clearly justifying the action of the court-martial, let us look for a moment at the effect upon other officers of the Army who have remained in the service during all of these long fourteen years' service that this man has performed no service whatever, has done no military duty. It is the injustice that the passage of this bill would do to such officers that makes it peculiarly objectionable in my mind. If this bill becomes a law this man takes his place, according to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. STEELE,] as the ninetieth or ninety-third captain. He goes over the heads of over two hundred officers of the same rank who have served for fourteen years, officers who have discharged their duties honorably and fully and maintained the dignity and efficiency of the service while he has been out of the service. And these are not new men, Mr. Chairman. They are men, as you will find by examining the Army Register, who have served in the Army honestly, 97 per cent. of them being volunteer officers, men who merit promotions; and yet this bill proposes, under these circumstances, to take this man and place him in a position above them in the service. It proposes to allow him to step to the front and take this promotion from the senior officers. In the language of the gentleman from Wisconsin, there is no way to maintain the discipline of the Army unless the judgments of courts-martial shall be sustained by Congress, and from personal experience and my knowledge of courts-martial, and the manner in which facts are obtained by them, I believe it to be a matter that will not admit of serious contradiction that in 90 per cent. of the cases upon which they act their process enables them to arrive at the absolute truth, and if a man is declared guilty by sentence of a court-martial, and they say dismiss him from the service, I believe in this proportion it will be done justly, honestly, and properly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon laying aside the bill and reporting it to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 47.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Let us have a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

Mr. SPARKS. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw the point and let the matter be settled by a vote in the House.

Mr. BRAGG. Then I renew the point that there is no quorum. When I am enlisted in a campaign I intend to go through with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. BRAGG and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 54.

Mr. BRAGG. No quorum. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not in order.

Mr. BRAGG. The announcement was made of the vote, and I object to counting additional members. I insist upon the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is insisted upon, that no quorum has voted, it is the duty of the Chair to cause the roll to be called.

Mr. BRAGG. I insist upon my motion that the committee rise and report to the House. The vote has been announced by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin himself having made the point of order that no quorum has voted, it is the duty of the Chair to cause the tellers to resume their places and continue the count.

The tellers having resumed their places, the committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 56.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DUNNELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. JOYCE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 909) for the relief of D. T. Kirby, had directed him to report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to yield to me that I may make a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BRAGG. I will yield for that purpose only.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HISCOCK, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4221) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HISCOCK. I give notice that I shall move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill after the call of States on Monday.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLACKBURN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4222) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPRIGNER. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, was received, announcing that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 164) granting a pension to Mary A. Davis;

A bill (S. No. 175) for the relief of D. T. Kirby; and

A bill (S. No. 314) to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service.

AMENDMENT TO APPORTIONMENT BILL.

Mr. JOYCE. At the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] I ask unanimous consent that an amendment he has prepared to the apportionment bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion the gentleman is entitled to have the amendment printed in the RECORD under the continuing order of the House. The amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

Add to section 2 as follows:

"And if the population of any State shall be ascertained, as hereinafter provided, to have increased above the enumeration of said State in 1880, to the full number of the ratio of representation for a member of the House of Representatives recognized by this act, namely, 151,912, said State shall be entitled to one additional Representative for each additional and full group of 151,912 inhabitants.

"The ascertainment of such increase of population shall be in the manner following:

"Whenever any State shall have deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, payable on the order of the Secretary of the Interior, a sum of money double in amount of the sum expended by the United States in the enumeration of the inhabitants of said State in 1880, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be made a new enumeration of the population of such State in the same manner and months that the enumeration of 1880 was made; and when he shall have certified to the Clerk of the House of Representatives that the total population of said State is greater by 151,912 than the number obtained by multiplying 151,912 by the number of the Representatives assigned to such State by this act, said State shall be entitled to one additional Representative for each full and additional group of 151,912 inhabitants; and the additional Representative or Representatives may be elected from the State at large to serve in the Congress next ensuing after the commencement of such enumeration, but shall be elected from a district to the Congress or Congresses subsequent thereto. If said Secretary shall doubt the accuracy of the first enumeration he may cause a second one to be made in whole or in part, and a material inaccuracy in such enumeration shall be a good and sufficient reason for the unseating of a Representative by the House to which he may have been elected and admitted.

"The Secretary of the Interior shall pay the entire expense of such enumeration or enumerations out of the sum or sums deposited to his order by said State. If the sum first deposited by said State shall not be sufficient for the defrayal of said expenses, the State shall deposit, as above, a sum sufficient therefor; nor shall he certify the results of the enumeration until such sufficient deposit has been made. Any remainder of such deposit or deposits after the payment of said expenses he shall return to said State."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRAGG. I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold his motion to allow the Chair to submit certain matters to the House?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

REFORM SCHOOL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CHACE, of Rhode Island, as a consulting trustee of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, to hold such office for a period of two years, as provided by law.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPARKS. The Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar reported a bill with a favorable recommendation——

Mr. BRAGG. I object to any debate on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. Is there a motion to adjourn pending?

The SPEAKER. There is; but the Chair asked unanimous consent to lay certain matters before the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us vote down the motion to adjourn. I object to anything coming in now by unanimous consent until the motion to adjourn is voted down.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 33, noes 72.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for tellers.

On the question of ordering tellers there were—ayes 5; not a sufficient number.

So tellers were not ordered, and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

D. T. KIRBY.

Mr. SPARKS. I now demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill (H. R. No. 909) for the relief of D. T. Kirby, which has been reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with a favorable recommendation.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on Mr. BRAGG's motion, there were—ayes 16, noes 74.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 2—not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask to have the engrossed bill read.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not a question now of reading the engrossed bill but of ordering the bill to be engrossed. It has not been ordered to be engrossed yet.

The SPEAKER. When the bill has been ordered to be read a third time the engrossed bill will have to be read if the gentleman from Wisconsin demands it. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. On the question of the engrossment and third reading of the bill, the House has decided that it be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen is under a mistake. The previous question was ordered on the engrossment and third reading. The question is now, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

The question being taken, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask to have the engrossed bill read.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is a very short bill and can be engrossed in a few minutes.

The Clerk read the engrossed bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is first in order.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn there were—ayes 2, noes 73.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there was aye 1, noes not counted.

Mr. BRAGG. I call for tellers.

On the question of ordering tellers there was aye 1.

So tellers were not ordered.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point that no quorum voted on the last vote.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary that a quorum shall vote on a motion to adjourn.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRAGG. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 36, noes 104.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the entire vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 97, noes 63, not voting 132; as follows:

Mr. SMITH, of New York, with Mr. ARMFIELD.

Mr. MARTIN with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. BARR.

Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. DWIGHT.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. CANNON.

Mr. DUNNELL with Mr. KENNA.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. O'NEILL.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, with Mr. HAWK.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. SHERWIN.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama, with Mr. RYAN.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. BELTZHOOVER.

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. YOUNG.

Mr. DEUSTER with Mr. GUENTHER.

Mr. MCCOOK with Mr. KING, on all political questions for to-day, reserving the right to Mr. MCCOOK to vote on this bill.

Mr. CONVERSE. I am paired with Mr. DWIGHT on all political questions. Not regarding this as such, I have felt it proper to vote on the passage of this bill.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INSPECTORS OF HULLS AND BOILERS.

Mr. SKINNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4223) amending section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, fixing the compensation of inspectors of hulls and boilers in the several districts of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR OF REFUGE ON LAKE HURON.

Mr. HORR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish to this House any additional information or estimates obtainable in reference to the harbor of refuge at or near the mouth of Au Sable River on the west coast of Lake Huron, survey of which has been made by order of Congress.

JANE VENABLE.

Mr. WARNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4224) for the relief of Mrs. Jane Venable; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SALARY OF INDIANA DISTRICT JUDGE.

Mr. PIERCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4225) to fix the salary of the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

MARION WILLIAMS.

Mr. PIERCE, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4226) to rerate the pension of Marion Williams; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

W. F. C. GREGORY, JR.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to the Sergeant-at-Arms thereof the sum of $300, or so much as may be necessary thereof, to pay the funeral and other expenses contracted for the sickness and death of William F. C. Gregory, jr., late an employé of the folding-room of this House; and there shall also be paid out of the contingent fund of this House three months' pay, from September 30, 1881, to his mother, Mrs. H. F. C. Gregory; both sums appropriated by this resolution shall be subject to the Committee on Accounts.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HOUK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to inquire and report to this House whether any disparity exists between the salaries of the employés of the House of Representatives and employés of the Senate, respectively; and in the event that such disparity is found to exist, that said committee be instructed and authorized to report some measure to equalize the same.

ALLEN EVANS.

Mr. ATHERTON. The bill (H. R. No. 1342) granting a pension to Allen Evans was by inadvertence referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions when it should have been referred to the Committee on Pensions. I ask that the former committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

POST-ROUTES IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. HUBBS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for reference to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, a bill to establish post-routes in North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Post-route bills are, under the rules, referred through the petition-box.

CATHARINE HENRY.

Mr. BEACH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4229) granting a pension to Catharine Henry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NEWBURGH, NEW YORK.

Mr. BEACH also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4230) for the erection of a public building at Newburgh, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF JOHN S. OVIATT.

Mr. HAWK, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4231) granting pensions to the minor heirs of John S. Oviatt; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES THOMPSON.

Mr. HARRIS, of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4232) for the relief of James Thompson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

W. B. HOMER.

Mr. CANDLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4233) for the relief of W. B. Homer; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHEYENNE AND BLACK HILLS TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. POST, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4234) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase the Cheyenne and Black Hills telegraph line, &c.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INOCULATION OF ANIMALS.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, presented a letter from Paris, France, to D. C. Smith, regarding the inoculation of animals to prevent disease, with accompanying letters from the National Board of Health and the Department of Agriculture; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

MISSISSIPPI, ALBUQUERQUE AND INTEROCEAN RAILWAY.

Mr. CRAVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4235) authorizing the Mississippi, Albuquerque and Interocean Railway Company, organized under the laws of Arkansas and New Mexico, to construct a railroad through the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS F. JOHNSON.

Mr. PETTIBONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4238) for the relief of Thomas F. Johnson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM WILSON.

Mr. PETTIBONE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4239) for the relief of William Wilson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHIRIQUI GRANT.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I ask consent to submit for immediate adoption the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be directed to furnish for the use of the Naval Committee advance copies without the maps of the letter of the Secretary of the Navy and the accompanying reports, communications and information relative to certain lands and harbors known as the Chiriqui grant.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. The reason for asking the adoption of this resolution is that the Public Printer informs us the maps to accompany this document cannot be prepared in less than two months.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENFORCEMENT OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in respect to a resolution of the House of Representatives, a list of the officers and employés of the Internal Revenue Bureau and of the Department of Justice who have been killed or wounded in the enforcement of the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

Mr. MARSH. I would like to have that document read and printed.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule it will be printed. The communication is referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BELFORD: The petition of Wolff & Brown, for pay for service of horses—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BOWMAN: The petition of Sweetsie Brothers of Boston, Massachusetts, for certain changes in laws relating to exportation of tobacco and snuff, and to export bonds therefor—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 13, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 232 of the Revised Statutes, an abstract of the militia force of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from Captain C. J. Allen, Corps of Engineers, of examinations of Beaver Bay, Grand Portage Bay, and Wans-wan-goning Bay, Minnesota, made in compliance with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1881; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution of the National Board of Trade, favoring the return of the balance of the Japanese indemnity fund after the payment of actual damages sustained by American citizens; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of the Rhode Island Woman Suffrage Association, signed by Elizabeth B. Chace, president, Sarah E. H. Doyle, chairman of the executive committee, and Frederic A. Hinckley, Anna E. Aldrich, and Mary J. Channing, members of the executive committee, remonstrating against any discrimination on account of sex in legislation in relation to the Territory of Utah; protesting against the admission of Dakota or any new State into the Union with any distinction of sex in the exercise of the right of suffrage; and praying that the necessary measures be taken to submit to the people an amendment to the Constitution providing that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. I move the reference of the memorial to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I also present a petition of citizens of Rhode Island, praying for the passage of an act providing that appointments to subordinate executive offices shall be made from persons whose fitness has been ascertained by competitive examination open to all applicants properly qualified, and that removals from such offices shall be made for legitimate causes only, and not for political opinion or for refusal to render party service. This petition is one of the most respectable in signature, and one of the most beneficient in its object of any that I have ever had the honor to present to the Senate. It was circulated by the Young Men's Political Club of Rhode Island, a very patriotic and intelligent body of young men, and it contains the signature of the governor of the State, of the judges of the supreme court, and of very many men of high reputation and standing in professional and mercantile circles. The subject of civil service reform has deeply engaged the attention of the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and while they present no plan in detail, leaving that to the wisdom and patriotism of Congress, they are very much in earnest in favor of a reform in this regard. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of Thomas D. Smith and others, citizens of Ravenna, Michigan, praying for legislation regulating charges for railroad transportation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of R. P. Fitzgerald & Co. and others, citizens of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a light-house at the entrance of Little Traverse Harbor, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of James Cummiskey and others, ex-Union soldiers, of Portland, Michigan, praying for the passage of the bill known as the equalization bounty bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of the Cincinnati Cigar Manufacturers' Association, praying for a reduction of the internal-revenue tax on cigars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAWLEY presented the petition of J. C. Lewis and 150 others, citizens of Connecticut, praying that the right to vote shall not be denied on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I present the petition of Sherman S. Rogers and many others, citizens of Buffalo, praying for the passage of a bill providing that appointments to subordinate executive offices shall be made from persons whose fitness has been ascertained by competitive examination, open to all applicants properly qualified, and that removals from such offices shall be made for legitimate cause only, such as dishonesty, negligence, or inefficiency, and not for political opinion, or for refusal to render party service; and also praying for the passage of what is known as the Pendleton bill on that subject.

This petition is signed by many leading citizens of Buffalo. I move its reference to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN presented the petition of the mayor and aldermen of the city of Brunswick, Georgia, praying for a charter across the peninsula of Florida for a barge canal, to connect the inland channel of the Atlantic coast with the inland channel of the Gulf coast, so as to connect the south Atlantic cities with Mobile and New Orleans by an inland channel; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of Miss Caroline De Treville and other citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, praying compensation for the services of their grandfather, John La Boulardrie De Treville, who was a chaplain in the Revolutionary Army; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

He also presented the petition of Hon. J. P. Carroll and other lawyers of the city of Columbia, South Carolina, praying for a change of the time of holding the terms of the United States district court in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of citizens of Tennessee, praying that Congress by appropriate legislation regulate the tariff of charges on railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, favoring the allowance of a pension to Captain Jacob Nix, of Brown County, Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a memorial, signed by Henry J. Latshaw and a large number of others, bankers, and members of the Board of Trade, wholesale merchants, and grain dealers of Kansas City, Missouri, in regard to the construction of bridges across the Missouri River and the improvement of that river. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 889) to provide for the erection of a public building in Jefferson City, in the State of Missouri, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. PLATT. The Committee on Pensions instruct me to make an adverse report on the bill (S. No. 607) to increase the pension of Hiram C. Shouse. This bill was introduced by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] and I am not sure that he does not wish to contest the report. I therefore ask that the bill may go on the Calendar for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported the following bills; which were read twice by their titles:

A bill (S. No. 1188) to confirm the homestead entry of John Waishkey, jr., and

A bill (S. No. 1189) to confirm the homestead entry of Hugh Foster.

Mr. PLUMB. On the 24th of January I reported from the Committee on Public Lands the bill (S. No. 439) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes. The report of that bill was an error. Another bill on the same subject, the bill (S. No. 67) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain and certify the amount of land located with military warrants in the States described therein, and for other purposes, was the bill which the committee had considered and designed to report. The two bills being upon the same subject, one bill was displaced and the other by mistake put in place of it. I ask that Senate bill No. 67 may take the place on the Calendar now occupied by Senate bill No. 439, and that Senate bill No. 439 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 67 will be placed on the Calendar at the point suggested, if there be no objection.

Mr. PLUMB. I move that Senate bill No. 439 be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say in reference to the bill reported by the Senator from Kansas, Senate bill 67, that it is not a unanimous report, and the minority of the committee will take occasion at an early day to submit their views in opposition to the bill.

HOUSE COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees of the House shall begin, to report it without amendment, and I ask that it may be read and considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that the pay of the clerks to committees of the House of Representatives, heretofore authorized by the House, who are paid during the session only, shall begin from the time such clerks entered upon the discharge of their duties as clerks to committees, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairmen of the several committees employing clerks for the session only.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GEORGE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1168) to amend the several acts in relation to the division of the State of Mississippi into judicial districts, and further to amend the several acts in relation to the northern judicial district of the State of Mississippi, and to provide for the times and places of holding the United States district courts in said northern district; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1169) in relation to changes of venue in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SAWYER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1170) granting a pension to Jane S. Taplin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1171) to quiet title to certain land in Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I understand, the bill is a mere question of law about some property here. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1172) for the relief of officers on the retired lists of the Army and Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CALL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1173) for the protection of actual settlers on the public domain; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1174) to grant the right of way over the public lands and a military reservation to the Jacksonville, Saint Augustine and Halifax River Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FERRY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1175) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1879; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1176) for the relief of Walker A. Newton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McMILLAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1177) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase pensions in certain cases," approved June 18, 1874; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1178) for the relief of Ignacio Chaves and others, their heirs and assigns; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. HAWLEY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1179) to create a district for the inspection of the hulls and boilers of steam-vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1180) for the relief of Austin G. Day; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PLUMB asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1181) to regulate promotion in and to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1182) for the relief of Isaac A. Meyer; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1183) providing for the adjustment of the claims of certain of the Confederated Peoria, &c., Indians, who became citizens of the United States under the treaty of 1867; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1184) to erect a public building in Chattanooga, Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. FERRY asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1185) for the relief of Walter F. Halleck; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1186) to provide suitable agricultural lands for the southern band of Ute Indians in lieu of lands heretofore provided for allotment to them; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. VEST asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1187) for the relief of Joseph Knight; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

DISTRICT ASSESSMENTS FOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BUTLER (by request) submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to furnish as soon as may be, for the information of the Senate, in respect to the bill No. 1295, pending in the House, entitled "An act to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia," and particularly with reference to sections Nos. 177, 178, and 184 of the said code, and now on the Calendar of the House—

First. A specific and detailed statement of all assessments for special improvements of the streets, avenues, and alleys in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, where the improvements for which said assessments were made and levied were not "completed" (at the time of such assessment) in accordance with the first section of an act of the late Legislative Assembly, approved August 10, 1871, entitled "An act prescribing the mode of assessment for special improvements and providing for the collection thereof."

Second. And if the said commissioners, or their predecessors in office, were advised by their respective attorneys for the said District that such assessments were "illegal" or "void," where the "improvements" were not "completed" in accordance with said first section of said act of the said Legislative Assembly, to furnish copies of such opinions.

Third. And if the said commissioners, or their predecessors in office, after such opinions were rendered as aforesaid, issued any tax-lien certificates in respect to such assessments so declared by the attorneys aforesaid to be "illegal" or "void" against the property of citizens within said District of Columbia, then, and in that event, said commissioners are directed to report their reasons therefor, and the cases in which such tax-lien certificates were so issued, and the names of the owners of property affected thereby, and the cases in which payments have been made thereunder.

Fourth. A detailed and specific statement of all real estate in said District which has been sold or conveyed by said commissioners, or their predecessors in office, for alleged non-payment of assessments for special improvements, so called, classifying in such statement sales, certificates of sales, or conveyances by virtue of said assessments on "incomplete" and "complete" improvements; likewise stating time of sale, to whom sold, and at what prices; the names of parties holding certificates under such sales; also all cases in which such sales were made before such assessments were finally "revised and corrected," as required by law. Also, all cases in which such assessments were sold and assigned by said District of Columbia, or any officer thereof, before such final "revision and correction," and to whom such sales or assignments were made. Also, the names of all persons, or banking associations, or corporations who have received certificates representing the amount of the reduction of such assessments after such final "revision and correction," commonly called drawbacks. Also, all cases in which such persons, or banking associations, or corporations have refused to receive or credit the amount of such certificates, or "drawbacks," on such original assessment certificate received or held by them, and the reasons assigned therefor.

Fifth. What amount of the arrears of general taxes on real estate mentioned on page 4 of the annual report of the said commissioners to Congress for the year ending June 30, 1880, and also for the year 1881, held by and claimed to be due to parties other than the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the resolution to be an absolute direction to the commissioners of the District of Columbia to report.

Mr. BUTLER. It is a resolution calling upon the commissioners for certain information. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT LIQUOR LICENSES.

Mr. ROLLINS. I submit a resolution which is substantially the resolution offered about a week ago by me, and objected to by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] The objection, I understand, has been withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to transmit, as soon as may be, to the Senate a statement showing the date when the retail liquor license, for the last license year, expired, the number of such licenses issued in the District of Columbia for the present license year, to whom and when issued, the place of business of each licensee and when the several applications for such licenses were approved by the liquor-license board, and to inform the Senate whether any of the retail liquor dealers were permitted to continue the sale of liquors after the expiration of the license for the last year and before obtaining a license for the present license year; and, if so, to report the names of such dealers, their places of business, and the time during which each was thus permitted to sell liquors without existing license; and whether any such dealers are now permitted to continue the sale of liquors without having an existing license; and, if so, their places of business; and further, to state by what authority of law such dealers, if any have been, or are now, permitted to sell liquors without an existing valid license; and also to furnish the Senate a list of all liquor dealers in the District of Columbia who have been convicted and fined in the police court during the last two years for violating the District license law and have been pardoned or released by the commissioners from the payment of the fines and penalties so imposed, with the reasons for such pardon or release in each case.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS. I now ask that the resolution of a similar character submitted by me on the 6th instant be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done, there being no objection.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands have leave to print so much of the evidence taken by them, under a resolution of the Senate, as they may deem necessary to show the condition of the General Land Office, which they were instructed to inquire into.

CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate the number and character of cannon now owned by the United States which have been condemned or are deemed unfit for use, and also whether the material of such cannon are needed or can be advantageously used by the United States in the manufacture of ordnance or for other purposes, and what is the market value of such condemned cannon, and also how many of such condemned cannon have been appropriated by special laws for specific purposes not yet delivered.

BUST OF COUNT PULASKI.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the alleged contract between the Committee on the Library and Henry D. Saunders for the execution of a bust in marble of the Count Pulaski, and to carry into effect the terms of said alleged contract, if the same be proven.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 909) for the relief of D. T. Kirby, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SAMSON GOLIAH.

Mr. LOGAN. I came to the Senate this morning in rather a feeble condition to make a request of the Senate. I ask that the bill (S. No. 423) for the relief of Samson Goliah, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, be recommitted to that committee. I have no objection to its retaining its place on the Calendar. I will state why I desire to have it recommitted.

I desire a recommittal of the bill so that I may have the privilege at least of making a report adverse to the passage of the bill. I am clearly of the opinion that the bill, if passed with the report accompanying it, would form a precedent that the Senate certainly does not wish to establish. It is clearly, in my judgment, in violation of every decision and law that ever has been framed in reference to military authority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inform the Senator from Illinois that the Senate is now, under the Anthony rule, considering cases upon the Calendar until half past one, and the bill to which he refers was up for consideration on Friday last in the Senate, and partial discussion was had upon it, when it was laid over.

Mr. LOGAN. I knew that from an examination of the RECORD. That is the way I came to a knowledge of the fact. I sent the other day to the clerk to get me the bill and report. He did so, and I have examined them, and I desire to make a minority report. It seems as though the bill had been reported from the Military Committee without objection. I want my objection to go on record, and I want to state it in the nature of a report. I therefore ask the Senate to allow the bill to be recommitted that I may have that opportunity.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not object to that course.

Mr. HARRISON. I wish merely to state the history of this matter. At the last Congress a similar bill was introduced either by my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] or by my predecessor, Mr. McDonald. It was referred to the Military Committee and was favorably reported by that committee in a report which I suppose is substantially the same as that made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] at this session. I have no objection, however, indeed I think it would be very indecorous to oppose the request of the chairman of the Military Committee in this matter. The bill has twice passed the committee, it seems, substantially unchallenged, and yet, as it involves a principle which is important, I am not disposed to antagonize the request to have it recommitted to the committee for further consideration. Indeed it is proper, in view of the statement of the chairman, that that course should be pursued. I ask, however, under the circumstances, that it may retain its place on the Calendar. There will be a meeting of the committee to-morrow, and probably early action may be had upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill can retain its place only by unanimous consent. If there be no objection, that will be done. The question is upon the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. Unless the Senator from Illinois has some special reason to believe that the committee would reconsider its action he can attain his purpose when the bill is reached upon the Calendar by asking that it go over for the purpose of his making a minority report. That privilege has been granted repeatedly, and it is never refused. It is not worth while for the bill in the course of business to go back to the committee for that purpose unless the Senator supposes that the committee will reconsider its former action. I merely make the suggestion to him that he could get the time when the bill is called regularly, as it is the unfinished business for the morning hour, to present his minority views.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say in response to the Senator from Arkansas that of course I could make a report provided I had the consent of the Senate. I am not in a very good condition, however, to discuss this proposition, and do not desire to do so now. I merely ask this as a favor of the Senate without giving any further reason except to say that I have an impression that if the bill is recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs they will not indorse the proposition, for I do not believe they have ever considered it. I know I was not present when it was considered. I do not say that they will adopt my views; I do not know anything about that; but I know that the bill involves a principle that the Military Committee have not agreed to except in one instance, and then not so unanimously as would seem to be the case now. I do not wish to see the Military Committee put on record, especially when I am chairman of it, as indorsing this proposition, and I want to have the bill recommitted in order to see whether the committee do agree to it; and if they do I want to make a minority report. I state that frankly as my object in having the bill recommitted, and the Senator who introduced the bill has no objection to a recommittal. I do not desire to remove the bill from its place on the Calendar at all, but I merely wish to have an opportunity to give my views in reference to it that they may go upon the record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks that the bill shall not lose its place on the Calendar. That can only be done by unanimous consent. That will be regarded as the understanding if there be no objection.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that at all.

MIAMI INDIAN LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the proceedings under the Anthony rule will begin.

The bill (S. No. 328) to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas was announced as first in order upon the Calendar, and its consideration was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. When the bill was last under consideration the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] inquired whether it had the approbation of the Department of the Interior. He is not in his seat at this moment, but, not desiring to take advantage of his absence, I send to the desk and ask to have read a printed communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which appears in the report of the House committee on a similar bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, January 11, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th instant inclosing H. R. No. 404, being "a bill to provide for the sale of the lands of the Miami Indians in Kansas," and requesting to be furnished with such information and suggestions as this bureau may be able to supply.

In reply I have to state that the bill referred to is identical in its provisions and form to a draft of a bill prepared in this office and submitted to the Department, with a full report of all the facts bearing upon the subject-matter of the same, on the 12th day of March, 1879.

I inclose herewith a copy of that report, with the remark that this office entertains the same views in respect of the sale of these lands at the present moment as are therein set out, and would therefore renew its recommendation for favorable action in the premises.

A slight amendment is called for in line 8 of the first section; it should read heirs-at-law instead of "heir-at-law."

I return herewith the bill, and will add, in conclusion, that I think, with the slight change referred to, it should be passed.

Very respectfully,

H. PRICE, Commissioner.

Hon. D. C. HASKELL,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill there referred to is identical in terms with Senate bill No. 328, upon which the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate is favorable.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PHILADELPHIA AND READING RAILROAD COMPANY.

The bill (S. No. 367) to release the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company from certain taxes was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the bill be passed over informally, so as not to lose its place on the Calendar. It is a bill of some importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over informally.

SUPPLIES TO SIOUX INDIANS IN 1862.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 36) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amounts due to citizens of the United States for supplies furnished to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the massacre of August, 1862, and providing for the payment thereof.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill was read when it was under consideration a few days ago. I then offered an amendment to the bill which I desire to withdraw, in order that I may offer another amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. In line 5, before the word "citizens," I move to strike out "to" and to insert "licensed traders," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate and determine the amounts due licensed traders, citizens of the United States, for supplies furnished, in the ordinary course of trade and business, to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota, subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the outbreak and massacre by said Indians in August, 1862.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. In line 6, I move to strike out the word "ordinary," before the word "course."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] who will be absent during this week, desired to be heard on this bill, and he had made some preparation on the subject. He had some documents, to which he called my attention, but I do not know where they are. I think it would be but just to him that this case should be postponed until his return. It seems that he, and probably the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] once investigated the matter pretty thoroughly, and they probably made a report upon it. I should not like to have the bill misplaced; and therefore I ask that it be passed over and be the first case on the Calendar on Monday next, as I understand the Senator from Kentucky will be here then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, and called when the Senator from Kentucky returns.

Mr. ALLISON. He may not get here on Monday. He will be here Monday or Tuesday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that the bill be passed over without prejudice, and it can be called up any day after the Senator from Kentucky returns.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not want to do any injustice to the case, and I only suggest that it may be the first case to be called after his return.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let it be understood that the bill will be called up during the morning hour upon the return of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, it being regarded as at the head of the Calendar when he returns.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be the understanding, if there be no objection.

THE MARINE CORPS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 12) to establish and equalize the grades and regulate appointments and promotions in the Marine Corps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON,] who has charge of this bill, is not in his seat. Shall it be passed over?

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope it will be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar. I know the Senator from New Jersey is very anxious to have it considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ALBERT H. EMERY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 111) for the relief of Albert H. Emery.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there any report?

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Tennessee the bill goes over.

COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 724) to fix the term of office of collectors of internal revenue.

Mr. INGALLS. Let that be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. ROLLINS. I hope the bill will not lose its place on the Calendar. In the absence of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who has it in charge from the Committee on Finance, I hope it will be passed over without prejudice.

PUNISHMENT OF DESERTION.

The bill (S. No. 493) to amend article 103 of the Rules and Articles of War was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends the one hundred and third of the Rules and Articles of War by adding thereto the following words:

No person shall be tried or punished by a court-martial for desertion committed more than two years before the arraignment of such person for such offense, unless he may meanwhile have absented himself from the United States, in which case the time of his absence shall be excluded in computing the period of the limitation: Provided, That said limitation shall not begin until the end of the term for which said person enlisted.

Mr. MAXEY. This bill was before the Senate at a previous session, and after some discussion, in which the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, took part, the bill was passed by the Senate without dissent. The bill now presented is in the identical words of the bill which passed the Senate after debate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SILAS Q. HOWE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 565) for the relief of Silas Q. Howe, surviving partner of William T. Pate & Co.; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Silas Q. Howe, surviving partner of William T. Pate & Co., of Patriot, Indiana, $19,385; being the amount due them for taxes paid the 16th of March, 1867, on distilled spirits which had already paid the tax required by law.

Mr. VOORHEES. There is a favorable report from the Committee on Finance, and I ask that it be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. VOORHEES from the Committee on Finance January 10, 1882:

The facts in this case are substantially these: the petitioners were licensed distillers at Patriot, Indiana, and had carried on that business on a large scale for many years. In the month of February, 1867, Mr. Reed, a revenue detective, made a report to the collector of the third Indiana district:

	Gallons.	Gallons.
1. That said firm had sold from September 1 to December 31, 1866, of distilled spirits, (see evidence, page 98)		197,894½
From their sales he deducted:
2. Tax-paid spirits on hand September 1, 1866, (see page 98)	3,650
3. Taxes paid on spirits from September 1 to December 31, 1866	184,552
		188,202
Alleging a deficit of		9,692½

Making a tax, at $2 a gallon, of $19,385.

Upon this report being made, the collector of said district seized the distillery, and the assessor assessed said sum against Pate & Co. without investigation of the facts. The petitioners, after the seizure of their distillery, paid the money on the 16th day of March, 1867, under protest, and in April, 1867, made application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for a release of their distillery and a repayment of the money, stating in their application that the tax was wrongfully assessed and collected; that the report of Mr. Reed was incorrect; that said sum ought to be refunded for the reasons—

	Gallons.
1. That their sales of distilled spirits from September 1 to December 31, 1866, were (see page 77)	211,798.00
2. That they had on hand September 1, 1866, of tax-paid distilled spirits (see page 77)	16,045.00
3. That the taxes paid by them on spirits from September 1 to December 31, 1866, were on	132,211.28
4. That they removed in bond (same period)	63,716.00
5. Paid alleged deficit March 16, 1867	9,692.50
Making total taxes paid	221,664.78
Deduct sales as above	211,798.00
Making erroneously paid (see page 77, printed evidence)	9,866.78

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, upon the receipt of the application made by claimants, released their distillery but refused to refund the money. He appointed another revenue agent to make an investigation of the facts, and this agent, after an examination of the matter, reported them to be as the claimants had stated, and said, among other things in his report, that—

"Mr. Pate is a man of large means and good credit. (See page 83.) I found nothing that looked like fraud in my investigations; everything is properly arranged about the distillery. (See page 83.)

"I am firmly convinced that great wrong has been done Mr. Pate. He has been greatly damaged in his business and injured in his reputation. (See page 81.)

"I respectfully but urgently recommend that Mr. Pate's distillery be released from seizure as soon as possible, and such other steps taken as your sense of justice shall dictate. (See page 82.)"

The assistant assessor of said district says:

"I hereby certify that I have carefully investigated the facts in the within affidavit of Silas Q. Howe and William T. Pate, of date of April 13, 1867, and from my own personal knowledge of said parties, and investigations made, I am fully satisfied that the same are in every respect true as therein set forth. I verily believe that the amount paid—$19,385—with the penalties, ought immediately to be refunded.

"JAMES H. TITUS,
"Assistant Assessor, Third District, Indiana.

"VEVAY, April 13, 1867.
"(See page 104 of evidence.)"

The late assistant assessor of said district says:

"I have carefully investigated the facts set forth in the affidavit of Silas Q. Howe and William T. Pate, of the firm of W. T. Pate & Co., and am satisfied that the facts as therein stated are in all respects just and true; that from my personal knowledge of the members of said firm, and their high standing and position as men of business, for truth and integrity, and the thorough investigations I have made of their books in 1862, '63, '64, '65, '66, I found no fraud upon their part, and always believed none was committed. I am satisfied from the present investigation that said distillery ought to be released, and that said sum paid by them ought in justice to be refunded, together with all penalties.

"JOHN F. DOAN,
"Late Assistant Assessor, Eighth Div., Third District, Indiana.

"VEVAY, April 13, 1867.
"(See page 100.)"

The deputy collector of said district says:

"I hereby certify that I have carefully investigated the facts in the affidavit of William T. Pate and Silas Q. Howe, of date of April 13, 1867, and that I fully believe the statements to be in all respects just and true, and that in justice to said Pate & Co., their distillery at Patriot, Indiana, ought to be released, as I am fully satisfied that there was no fraud committed by them upon the revenue, as alleged by Alexander Reed, revenue agent; and that the sum of $19,385, and all penalties, should be immediately refunded. Witness my name and official seal this 13th day of April, 1867.

[SEAL.] "JAMES J. SERING,
"Deputy Collector, Seventh Division, Third District, Indiana.

"(See page 101.)"

Another deputy collector of said district says:

"UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE,
"DEPUTY COLLECTOR'S OFFICE,
"Third District, Indiana, May 8, 1869.

"I hereby certify that I have carefully investigated the facts set forth in the affidavit of W. T. Pate and Silas Q. Howe, and the exhibit 'A' therein referred to, and find the same to be in all respects just and true, as therein set forth. * * * That the quantity, paid taxes, and removal in bond, exceed their sales by 9,866.96 gallons, and that the sum of $19,385, the tax on 9,692½ gallons, should be refunded, as it has been twice assessed and paid the tax.

"R. F. T. ABBOTT,
Deputy Collector.

"(See page 61.)"

The collector for said district says:

"I hereby certify that I have carefully investigated the facts in the within affidavit, and am satisfied that the statements are in all respects just and true, and I further certify, upon personal examination, that the name of the claimants and the amounts claimed are found reported on page 1, line 1, of the lists of Form 93, for September and October, 1866, and again reported on page 1, line 9, of the list of Form 23, of February, 1867, now on file in my office, and the same was paid on the 17th and 24th of September, 20th of October, 1866, and again paid on the 16th day of March, 1867, and is included in the aggregate receipts for said lists, the receipts amounting to $251,800, and delivered to the assessor to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and has not been allowed in any form. Dated May 29, 1869.

"SMITH JONES.
"Collector, Third District, Indiana.

"(See page 61.)"

The assessor of said district also certifies to the correctness of the facts as stated by Pate & Co. (See page 61.)

There is a great deal of other evidence in the record not necessary to be stated here, as it merely corroborates that of the assessors, collectors, and deputy collectors, and assistant assessors. Upon this testimony, and after a very careful examination of all the facts and figures contained in the voluminous record before us, the committee are of the opinion that there was an erroneous assessment and collection of the tax on 9,692½ gallons of spirits, and that it ought to be refunded. We therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CREEK ORPHAN FUND.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 126) to reimburse the Creek orphan fund.

Mr. SLATER. I ask that that bill may be passed over this morning without losing its place. There are some papers connected with it which we have not at hand. I wish it called up to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done if there be no objection.

DANIEL M. APPEL.

The bill (S. No. 668) to authorize Dr. Daniel M. Appel, of the United States Army, to receive pay for discharging the duties of physician to the Mescalero Apache Indian agency, New Mexico, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in that case be read.

The Principal Legislative Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. LOGAN January 10, 1882:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 668) to authorize Dr. Daniel M. Appel, of the United States Army, to receive pay for discharging the duties of physician to the Mescalero Apache Indian agency, New Mexico, have considered the same, and beg leave to submit the following report:

This is a bill to authorize Assistant Surgeon Daniel M. Appel, of the United States Army, to receive pay for services rendered as a physician at the Mescalero Apache Indian agency, New Mexico, from January 1, 1877, to March 31, 1879, at the rate of $50 per month.

From the evidence presented it appears:

1. That the services were rendered in good faith by Dr. Appel under an agreement with the agent at the Mescalero Apache Indian agency.

2. That it was impracticable to obtain the services of any other physician, and that Dr. Appel was compelled to travel thirty-five or forty miles from his regular station, Fort Stanton, New Mexico, through a dangerous country, at his own expense, in order to render this service.

3. That notwithstanding this arduous service, Dr. Appel at no time neglected his duty as a medical officer of the Army, but made professional visits to the Indian agency only at such times as would not interfere with his duties at Fort Stanton, and always with the permission and approval of the commanding officer of that post.

The just and equitable right to payment for such services has already been recognized and determined by Congress in similar claims of Assistant Surgeon Thomas F. Azpell, United States Army, by act approved January 16, 1877, and Assistant Surgeon J. A. Fitzgerald, United States Army, by act approved March 1, 1879.

The Army regulations, which are sanctioned by and have the effect of law, prescribe the duties of medical officers of the Army as follows:

"Medical officers, where on duty, will attend the officers and enlisted men and the servants and laundresses authorized by law, and at stations where other medical attendance cannot be procured without great expense or inconvenience, and on marches, the hired men of the Army and the families of officers and soldiers."

This committee recommend that the claim of Dr. Appel be allowed, as, in addition to all of the duties devolving upon him as a medical officer of the Army he responded to the calls made upon him for his professional services at the Indian agency, thirty-five or forty miles distant from his station, in the same manner as any private physician would have responded, and as medical officers are frequently called upon, when serving at frontier posts, in cases of emergency and in the interests of humanity.

The location or residence of the nearest private physician to the Mescalero agency was about one hundred and forty miles distant.

The services rendered by Dr. Appel, at great personal risk and at his own expense, and for which this moderate compensation is asked, would have cost the Government, at the lowest calculation, twice the amount claimed if a physician had been appointed for service at the agency, and at the least calculation five times the amount had the nearest private physician been called.

For all these reasons it seems just that the bill should pass, and Dr. Appel be allowed to receive the pay agreed upon, notwithstanding the provisions of section 1765 of the Revised Statutes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

GEORGE P. WEBSTER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 605) for the relief of George P. Webster; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the accounting officers of the Treasury to place to the credit of George P. Webster, late a captain and assistant quartermaster of United States volunteers, the amount suspended in his accounts as quartermaster, which was disbursed in payment of rents for certain property in the city of Covington, Kentucky, used for military purposes during the period from October 1, 1862, to August 31, 1865; and releases him and his official sureties or bondsmen from any liability to the United States on account of the amount suspended.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT LARNED MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. No. 346) to provide for the disposition of the Fort Larned Military Reservation, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLUMB. I move in line 11, section 2, to strike out the word "half," so that in place of providing "that no person shall be permitted to purchase more than one-half quarter-section of said land," it shall be "that no person shall be permitted to purchase more than one quarter-section," which is the amount of land the Government permits parties to take under the land laws of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

P. B. PERRY, SENIOR.

The bill (S. No. 228) granting a pension to P. B. Perry, sr.; was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of P. B. Perry, sr., a soldier of the Mexican war.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. GROOME January 10, 1882:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 228) granting a pension to P. B. Perry, sr., a soldier in the Mexican war, have carefully examined the same, and report:

That the claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions because the claimant could not furnish the evidence of the commissioned officer or the surgeon of his regiment on account of their death or removal. He, however, furnishes the testimony of two comrades, who testify that they were in the battle of Chapultepec with him and saw him wounded. The report of the Adjutant-General shows that his regiment was in said battle, and the evidence of his neighbors and friends, one of whom is a practicing physician, shows that he is suffering from what they suppose to be the effects of a wound. The committee believe that there is sufficient evidence to justify them in recommending the passage of the bill granting to him a pension.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TARIFF AND TAX COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill in order on the Calendar, which is the bill (S. No. 22) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws, the Chair supposes the Senator from Vermont does not wish to call up now.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose it will be objected to on the part of gentlemen who desire to address the Senate; otherwise I should much prefer to have it up now and disposed of.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think we had better consider it under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over; and also the next bill on the Calendar, which is on the same subject, Senate bill No. 86.

DISMISSAL OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 689) to promote the efficiency of the Navy, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Whenever on an inquiry had pursuant to law concerning the fitness of an officer of the Navy for promotion it shall appear that such officer is unfit to perform at sea the duties of the place to which it is proposed to promote him, by reason of drunkenness, or from any cause arising from his misconduct or want of capacity not caused by or in consequence of the performance of his duty, the bill provides that he shall not be placed on the retired list of the Navy, and he shall be discharged from the service; and in that case he may, by order of the President, be allowed and paid the pay of his grade for not longer than two years next after such discharge.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report with that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear an explanation.

Mr. ANTHONY. The bill carries its own report with it. It is the same bill we passed at the last Congress after full debate and without a dissenting vote. It is that when a naval officer is examined for promotion and is declared unfit for promotion by reason of continual drunkenness or any incapacity arising from his own misconduct and not in any respect from the line of duty, he shall not be put upon the retired list, but shall be discharged from the service, in which case the President may in his discretion allow him two years' pay. I recollect when it was up before, on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] it was amended to one year's pay, so as to make it correspond with the Army. I have no objection to that amendment if the Senator desires to make it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that amendment, to say "one year's pay." Two years' pay is entirely too much for a man dismissed under such circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, in line 13, to strike out "two years'" and insert "one year's."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES M. BACON.

The bill (S. No. 323) for the relief of James M. Bacon was considered as in Committee of the Whole. By it the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are directed, in the settlement and adjustment of the accounts of James M. Bacon, late a lieutenant in the First Regiment Dakota Cavalry Volunteers, to allow credit for the disbursement of the public funds disbursed by him as acting assistant quartermaster on account of the expenses incurred by the Northwest Indian expedition in the months of July, August, September, October, and November, 1864, and for the disbursement of which proper vouchers were taken, but which were lost or destroyed through no fault or neglect of his, upon satisfactory evidence being furnished of the actual disbursements of the funds for the benefit of the public service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the final passage of the bill I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] who reported it if it is the same bill in terms that was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs at the last session of Congress?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it is so exactly; that is my impression about it; and the report which is now made is the same report which was made at the last Congress. I think I adopted the report of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] who was then on the Military Committee.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH HERTFORD.

The bill (S. No. 790) for the relief of Joseph Hertford was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Joseph Hertford, of Cairo, Greene County, New York, of $413.93, in full for all claims by him for compensation for services as clerk at the Sac and Fox Indian agency from April 24, 1879, till July 9, 1879, inclusive, and from October 1, 1879, till December 31, 1879, inclusive.

Mr. HOAR. I can make a statement which I suppose will save the necessity of having the report read. This bill is proposed at the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior——

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no use of any explanation, I think. I investigated the case once myself, and I think it is exactly right.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES P. CHOUTEAU.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 184) for the relief of Charles P. Chouteau; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Court of Claims be authorized to grant a rehearing in the case of Charles P. Chouteau, surviving partner of Chouteau, Harrison & Valle, and William A. Steele, against the United States, with jurisdiction to hear and determine the amount, if any, due under the contract for the construction of the ironclad vessel Eulah, by reason of the delays occasioned in such construction by the acts of the Government beyond the period specified in the contract, or for extras beyond what was provided therein. If upon such rehearing a receipt dated April 24, 1866, shall be given in evidence, the court may give judgment for such sum as shall be justly and equitably due notwithstanding such receipt.

Mr. HOAR. I think that is a case which should be explained to the Senate before it is acted upon, and as that will carry it past the hour of half past one, it is hardly worth while to begin the matter now. Let the bill stand in the first place for to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be pursued. The hour of half past one has arrived.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his Secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 11th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 546) to restore certain articles of silverware to Mrs. Isabella S. McRae.

D. T. KIRBY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to a bill that passed the House of Representatives on Friday, the same bill having passed the Senate on the same day.

Mr. VEST. The bill for the relief of D. T. Kirby?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill for the relief of D. T. Kirby. The Chair will lay the House bill before the Senate.

Mr. VEST. I ask that that bill lie on the table and be printed.

The bill (H. R. No. 909) for the relief of D. T. Kirby was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS ACT.

Mr. INGALLS. Regular order. Let the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] on the 12th of January, relative to the arrears of pensions act.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the regular order be laid aside informally, that I may call up the bill of which I gave notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the pending order be laid aside temporarily. If there be no objection, this will be done. The Chair hears no objection.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. DAWES. I call up for reference the bill (S. No. 939) providing for entrance into and promotion in the civil service of the Government by competitive examination. I should like to have the bill read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That every application for appointment to a position in the civil service of the Government shall be in the handwriting of the applicant, and be addressed to the head of the Department in which service is sought, and shall state the date and place of birth of the applicant, his legal residence, and his previous occupation. It shall be accompanied by no recommendation from any other person, except as to the personal character of the applicant, and shall contain or disclose no political opinion or affiliation of such applicant.

SEC. 2. That applications for appointment in the Departments in Washington will be received only for appointments to clerkships of class one, and to places of the compensation of $1,200 or under a year. These appointments are open to competition to any citizen of the United States, male or female. Vacancies in offices in the Departments above class 1, or in those of higher compensation than $1,200 a year, shall be filled by competitive examination, under rules and regulations to be approved and promulgated by the President, from among applicants already in the service in the Departments; but if no such applicant be found qualified and fitted, upon a competitive examination of all such applicants, the vacancies shall be filled by competitive examination open to all citizens, in conformity with the provisions of this act for admissions to offices in the Departments not above the grade of class one, or of $1,200 a year. The head of the Department may, at his discretion, open to competition exclusively by women the vacancies occurring in offices of the rate of compensation of $900 a year; but all admissions to that grade or class of compensation shall be by competitive examination under the rules prescribed by this act.

SEC. 3. That applications for appointment in custom-houses, post-offices, and other offices connected with the civil service can be received only for places of the compensation of $1,200 a year or under; and vacancies in offices above class 1, or above the salary of $1,200 a year, shall be filled from among clerks applying who are already in the service, if any such applicants shall be found competent, upon a competitive examination of all such applicants, conducted in accordance with the provisions for admission to the lowest grade; but if no such applicant shall be found qualified and fitted, upon such examination, the vacancies shall be filled on a like examination open to all citizens applying in manner provided in this act.

SEC. 4. That the President shall designate in each of the Executive Departments three persons to act as a board of examiners, which board shall, until changed by him, conduct all examinations for admission into or promotion in said Departments, under rules and regulations to be approved and promulgated by him.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall apply to custom-houses, post-offices, and all other bureaus and offices connected with the civil service in which more than twenty persons are employed; and the head of the Department which controls such custom-house, bureau, or office may designate a board, to consist of one of the board of examiners in such Department and two others employed in any such post-office, custom-house, or office not situated in the city of Washington, to conduct the examinations provided for in this act.

SEC. 6. That the times and places for all such examinations shall be fixed, and such rules and regulations for the conduct thereof shall be made, subject to approval and promulgation by the President, as shall be best calculated to disclose, so far as possible, the fitness of all applicants for the service sought, including, among other things, personal integrity, good habits, industry, temper, patience, and special aptitude for the service required; but no disclosure of political opinion or affiliation shall be required or permitted.

SEC. 7. That every person thus examined shall be marked and graded accordingly, and the appointments shall be made from among the three highest on the list of those so examined, marked, and graded.

SEC. 8. That the appointment of all persons entering the civil service in accordance with these regulations shall be made for a probationary term of six months, during which the conduct, fitness, and capacity of such persons shall be tested, and if at the end of said probationary term satisfactory proof of their fitness shall have been furnished to the head of the Department in which they shall have been employed during said term, they shall be reappointed: Provided, That any person who, after long and faithful service in a Department, shall be incapacitated by mental or bodily infirmity for the efficient discharge of the duties of his position, may be appointed by the head of the Department, at his discretion, to a position of less responsibility in the same Department.

SEC. 9. That in conducting examinations for admission to and promotion in the Marine Hospital Service and the Revenue Marine Service the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to designate special boards of experts to conduct such examinations, instead of the standing board of examiners.

SEC. 10. That the appointment of persons to be employed exclusively in the secret service of the Government, also of persons to be employed as translators, stenographers, or private secretaries, or to be designated for secret service, to fill vacancies in clerkships in either of the executive departments at Washington, may be excepted from the operation of this act: Provided, however, That every such person, prior to appointment in the cival service, shall be subjected to and successfully pass, before the standing board or other board specially constituted for the purpose, a test examination as to his qualifications and fitness for the service sought.

SEC. 11. That any examiner or other person in the public service who shall willfully and corruptly, by himself or in co-operation with one or more other persons, defeat, deceive, or obstruct any person in respect of his or her right of examination according to any such rules or regulations, or who shall willfully, corruptly, and falsely mark, grade, estimate, or report upon the examination or proper standing of any person examined hereinunder, or aid in so doing, or who shall willfully and corruptly make any false representations concerning the same or concerning the person examined, or who shall willfully and corruptly furnish to any person any special or secret political or other information for the purpose of either improving or injuring the prospects or chances of any person so examined, or to be examined, being appointed, employed, or promoted, shall for each such offense be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not less than ten days nor more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 12. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to take from those honorably discharged from the military or naval service any preference conferred by the seventeen hundred and fifty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes, nor to take from the President any authority, not inconsistent with this act, conferred by the seventeen hundred and fifty-third section of said statutes; nor shall this act apply to any person whose annual compensation as fixed by law is less than $900, nor to any person employed merely as a laborer or workman, nor, unless by direction of the Senate, to any person who has been nominated for confirmation by the Senate.

SEC. 13. That this act shall take effect on and after the 1st day of July next.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the general public anxiety for an improvement in the methods of appointments to office is a healthy sign. That there is diversity of opinion as to the best mode of securing it is no cause for discouragement. The more urgent and constant this anxiety for a better way shall become the more surely will that diversity of plans which now troubles us disappear. Every day's experience and discussion make more clear the necessity of which will be born the cure. Every Presidential election, with the years of trouble which follow it, each with its own peculiar complications, adds to the perils existing methods are bringing upon our institutions, and to the efforts of earnest men to ward them off. These perils do not spring entirely out of political methods, demoralizing and dangerous as they are, but are in part organic. The nation has outgrown its own constitutional provisions for appointments to office, and its multiplied functions cannot be much longer administered according to the original plan. The outgrowth itself has contributed in part to the possibility of prostituting the service to the behests of partisan exigency, which now control appointments to office. The Constitution puts the appointing power substantially, and almost exclusively, in the first instance, in the President. He is to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint all officers, except a few named in the Constitution, and to such inferior offices as the appointment to which may, by statute, be conferred upon courts of law or heads of Departments.

In a government made for the thirteen original States it was entirely competent for one man to personally direct the appointments and dispense the patronage involved in its administration. But it is quite another thing in the Government of to-day. There were then but thirteen States, comparatively small. There are now thirty-eight, some of them as large as the Empire of France. Then there were less than 4,000,000 people to be governed and guarded; now 50,000,000. The thirteen States over which the Constitution was first established contained less than 350,000 square miles of territory lying along the Atlantic border. The United States of to-day extends its power over 4,000,000 of square miles, reaching across the continent and into the frozen regions of Alaska. Then a little over $3,000,000, to be collected and disbursed, sufficed for the wants of the Government. Since then nearly $2,000,000,000 a year have been gathered and expended to carry on and preserve that Government; and there have been times when more has been disbursed in a single day than enough to pay the whole expenses of the Government for a year when it began. About four hundred millions of dollars are now required each year to be collected and disbursed in carrying on this Government, by officers stationed at all points, some of them thousands of miles beyond the observation or reach of those responsible for their appointment.

When this Government was inaugurated, and a single man clothed with power to make appointments to office, less than a thousand men were enough to carry on all its operations. Now a hundred thousand are required for that same purpose, and their appointment is to be made, their administration to be watched, and their fitness to be tested, by that same one man. Although statutes under the constitutional provision have conferred upon the heads of Departments the authority for making many of these appointments, yet practically the large body of them look up to him who makes and unmakes heads of Departments, for appointments to a great majority of places throughout the length and breadth of the land. Did no other element come in to disturb and distract, to warp and to blind, this work of itself is more than one man can accomplish, even were he left alone and had no other duty but to devote himself exclusively to the work of selecting or retaining for official position those to be trusted with the many and varied functions of this Government, to be discharged at all points and under all circumstances of delicacy, of trust, and of efficiency.

If this vast increase of work, this multiplication of duties intrinsically difficult enough in the beginning were all the difficulties that beset the path of a President, it were still well worth the consideration of all earnest statesmen whether the original plan of vesting the appointing power well-nigh absolutely in the hands of one man did not imperatively demand revision. To all this, however, is added an element of embarrassment and complicated labor not contemplated by those who framed the Government. Political considerations have come to play the most important part in the distribution of this vast patronage. I do not stop to consider the origin of this evil, or to charge it upon one political party more than another. I would deal with the fact confessed by all observers and commended by not a few, that "to the victors belong the spoils;" that with each new administration comes the business of distributing patronage among its friends. It has come to be that the work of readjustment, of paying political debts, and discharging political obligations, of rewarding personal friends and punishing personal foes, is the first to confront each President on assuming the duties of his office, and is ever present with him during his continuance therein, giving him no rest and but little time for the transaction of any other business, or for the study of any higher or grander problems of statesmanship. He is compelled to give daily audience to those who personally seek place or to the army of those who back them. He is to do what some predecessor of his has failed to do, or to undo what others before him have done; to put this man up and that man down as the system of political rewards and punishments shall seem to him to demand. Instead of the study of great questions of statesmanship, of broad and comprehensive administrative policy, either as it may concern this particular country at home, or the relations of this great nation to the other nations of the earth, he must devote himself to the petty business of weighing in the balances the political considerations that shall determine the claim of this friend or that to the possession of some office of profit or honor under him.

The very office of Chief Magistrate has undergone in practice such a radical change that the President of the Republic created by the Constitution in the beginning and the Chief Magistrate of to-day are two entirely different public functionaries. There has grown up such a perversion of the duties of that high office, such a prostitution of it to ends unworthy the great idea of its creation, imposing burdens so grievous to be borne, and so degrading of all the faculties and functions becoming the ruler of a great people that a change has already come in the character of the Government itself which, if not corrected, will be permanent and disastrous. Thus hampered and beset the Chief Magistrate of this nation wears out his term and his life in the petty services of party, and in the bestowal of the favors its ascendancy commands. He gives daily audience to beggars for place and sits in judgment upon the party claims of contestants.

The Executive Mansion is besieged, if not sacked, and its corridors and chambers are crowded each day with the ever-changing but never-ending throng. No Chief Magistrate since the evil has grown to its present proportions but has cried out for deliverance. Physical endurance even is taxed beyond its power. More than one President is believed to have lost his life from this cause. The spectacle exhibited of the Chief Magistrate of this great nation, feeding, like a keeper his flock, the hungry, clamorous, crowding, jostling multitude which daily gathers around the dispenser of patronage is humiliating to the patriotic citizen interested alone in national progress and grandeur.

I arraign no President, and I would say nothing to belittle the great office which represents the character, the power, and the influence of this people among the nations of the earth. I speak only of patent facts, facts which I deplore. In these latter days each President steps into a current the force of which is constantly increasing. He can neither stem nor control it, much less his own course, as he is buffeted and driven hither and thither by its uncertain and unmanageable forces.

The necessity of good administration imperatively demands a change. Personal attention to considerations which should control executive action in the disposition of patronage and in the selection of officials is coming to be an impossibility, and political control, as the guide to such action, is coming to be fraught with demoralization and peril to the Republic. The Executive must be lifted out of this current or be carried away by it.

But the malign influence of political domination in appointments to office is widespread and reaches out from the President himself to all possible means of approach to the appointing power. It poisons the very air we breathe. No Congressman in accord with the dispenser of power can wholly escape it. It is ever present. When he wakes in the morning it is at his door, and when he retires at night it haunts his chamber. It goes before him, it follows after him, and it meets him on the way. It levies contributions on all the relationships of such a Congressman's life, summons kinship and friendship and interest to its aid, and imposes upon him a work which is never finished and from which there is no release. There is literally no discharge from this warfare for place. Time is consumed, strength is exhausted, the mind absorbed, and the vital forces of the legislator, mental as well as physical, spent in the never-ending struggle for office. I speak in the presence of those whose daily experience must corroborate what I say, and must cry out with the President himself for deliverance.

There is another element in the distribution of public patronage not affecting those in political accord with the appointing power alone, nor confined to the Congressmen here in Washington, though here most manifest and most persistent. It has come to be a widespread belief that the public service is a charitable institution, furnishing employment to the needy and a home to those adrift. Employment is sought of the Government because it cannot be found elsewhere, and to escape actual want. The number of those who thus crowd all avenues of approach to places in the public service is constantly on the increase, and is daily becoming more importunate.

The late Secretary of the Treasury, the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] is reported to have said that five-sixths of the applicants for office, while he administered the Treasury, were the poor and needy, seeking for the means of livelihood. This element, driven by necessity, pays little heed to party lines, and approaches Republicans and Democrats alike with its importunities. It appeals to the best impulses of their natures, and it seeks their services regardless of political affinities. I venture to say that no one who hears me has escaped its entreaties or turned a deaf ear, however small the probability of relief. This class of place-seekers follows the public service everywhere, and the public man in every position, who has influence to exert or a place to fill. No one can stop his ears to its pitiful cry, or resist its importunities. And every one who walks the streets of Washington, or dwells within the shadow of the Government service anywhere in this land, is pressed into the work of dispensing charity through the emoluments of official position. No one can criticise the motive which prompts the pressure of this class of applicants for office upon the appointing power, but every one must see that to yield to that pressure is to subordinate the demands of the public service to the claims of charity, and to lose sight of the exigencies of the Government and the standard of excellence in those who serve it, in the vain attempt to make it an almoner to the needy.

One need not go farther in a discussion of the departure in the methods and motives which control appointments to offices from that standard of the highest possible excellence and fitness in the public servant of whatever station, which was the ideal of the framers of the Constitution, and without which government is sure to fail of the best results. That departure is too apparent to tolerate debate. The facts are too manifest, and the experiences of public life to-day are too sharp and universal for dispute.

This much is patent:

1. That in the growth and expansion of the nation the appointing power is taxed beyond the possibility of personal attention to the requirements of official positions increased a hundredfold in number, and many fold in the variety and responsibility of the duties to be performed.

2. That in the discharge of this, the highest of all executive functions, political influences and compensations have come to dominate and subordinate all other considerations, and the distribution of official spoils to be the lawful prerogative of political ascendancy.

3. Offices have come to be sought and bestowed as so many charities furnishing support to the needy, and not as so many trusts imposing duties to the State.

This wide departure bodes no good. It is a perversion of the true purposes for which official positions in the Government were created, and is fraught with evil. It prostitutes the appointing power to ignoble ends and degrades the service of the State to the level of compensation for service of party, or a refuge from failure in all other services. It loads the Chief Magistrate with burdens too grievous to be borne, and he staggers and stumbles beneath them. Under it official positions are bought and sold, and the price is political servitude. Because of it honest but mistaken poverty is induced to forego the comforts and independence which reward honorable toil, and become a suppliant for the official crumbs which fall from the table of some political master.

Can legislation bring the exercise of the appointing power in this Government back to the point of departure from the idea of the fathers, that the fittest only should be summoned to fill the places of honor and trust under it? Is it possible by legal enactment to banish partisan tests, and the system of political rewards and punishments from the administration of the appointing power, and install again in authority the old test, long since laid aside: "Is he honest, is he capable?" To an effort for this end earnest and thoughtful men in this country, largely observant of public affairs, have directed their attention and contributed their labor. The many methods for restoration and reform, put forth from as many sources, attest the wide-spread solicitude and the deep-seated anxiety, as well as the earnest determination to secure a change. The bill now before the Senate, introduced a few days since by myself, and the one already before the Committee on Civil Service, introduced by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] are both designed to inaugurate such a change. If either of these should become a law, and be enforced in the spirit and for the sole purpose which has prompted its introduction, it would, in my opinion, within the scope of its application, work that change. It is to point out the difference between these two bills that I detain the Senate at this stage of the discussion.

There is a vice in our system of appointments to office developed and constantly aggravated by the expansion and growth of the nation, which lies deeper than the evils these bills are intended to remove. Indeed its existence makes the spoils system and the growth of lesser evils that spring up around it possible. Let this be eradicated, and with it will come up to the sun and wither, the very roots of the evils we complain of. That vice is the absence of direct responsibility. The wide distance and the many intermediates now intervening between the appointing power and the appointee, between him who controls and him who is controlled, constitute the great opportunity for party politics and every other unsavory and unhealthy influence to determine the direction of that control. Were it possible, under our Constitution, to bring the appointing power and the appointee, in all cases, into actual contact, so that he who is responsible for the character of the work to be performed shall also and always have authority over and be responsible for the character of him who is to perform that work, there would then be little room for any intervening influence that would impair a result upon which should depend the continuance of the authority itself. If, for instance, the organism of this Government had been such that every head of a division in the Treasury Department had been made responsible for the character of the work to be performed under him, and clothed with authority to select for himself the agents by whom that work was to be done, his own official head depending upon the attainment of the highest possible results, no power could divert that official from a search for the fittest, regardless of politics or favor, for a work in which anything short of the best would be fatal to himself. He would be deaf to any appeal and uninfluenced by any consideration which did not warrant that result.

The Census Bureau under General Walker is an imperfect illustration of what I mean. Congress prescribed the work and made the appropriation; General Walker undertook the performance, made his own rules, selected his own agents, and was responsible for the result. Commissions under him were, as the Constitution required, in the name of the Secretary of the Interior, but the selections were his. No one in practice intervened between him and the employé, and no one is entitled to the credit of that great work but the man to whom each one who contributed to it was directly responsible for what he did. The New York post-office is another and better example. The postmaster alone is appointed here. The Department allows him a given sum to carry on his office and he makes his own selection of agents to do the work. Since 1875 a method of appointment and retention in service has prevailed in that office which makes any man's hold upon his place depend solely upon the character of the performance of his task. No person or power intervenes between the head of that office and those who do his bidding. As a consequence, everything moves with the precision and perfection of clockwork, and such satisfactory results are attained that no political power could dislodge the incumbent. A late auditor of the Treasury, now deceased, was once called before the Committee of Appropriations of the House to explain a call for fifty additional clerks which had been repeated two years in succession. This question was put to him:

Does not your fifteen years' experience in office suggest some change, either in methods of appointments or manner of administration, that shall insure greater efficiency or economy?

The answer is instructive.

Were I permitted to manage the business of my office, as any good business man would manage two hundred and fifty men under him, I would undertake to produce better results than I now do, with fifty less men than I now have, but as at present managed the office must have fifty more. I can have no choice in the selection or retention of the men under me. A power above me puts to work under me whom he pleases, discharges whom he pleases, transfers the most efficient to other duties if he likes, and promotes without consultation with me. I cannot discharge a dunce or a drone, or a rascal; I cannot promote merit or discharge incompetence. Men come to service under me commissioned by one who neither knows the character of the men he sends to me nor the work they are to perform.

Could the law establish on the principles here suggested the control of the appointee by him in charge and responsible for the work under him throughout the civil service, it would cut up, root and branch, the whole spoils system, and drive the party "henchman" and the "dead-beat" out of places of trust and responsibility under the Government. But this cannot be, as the civil service of the country is at present constituted. And without further elaboration I suggest it here only that its lesson may not be lost sight of in comparing the two measures proposed to remedy the evils within our reach. Any measure which tends to widen the distance between the appointing power and the appointee, or puts any new intervening obstacle or authority between him who is responsible for what is to be done and the agent by whom it is to be done aggravates to that extent the very evil it strives to remove. And any measure, on the other hand, which in its application will bring in closer contact the appointing power and the appointee, and will bring authority and responsibility directly to the door of performance, by that much will disarm the very evil with which it is contending.

The Government should command the best possible civil service, and it is the duty of the legislator to secure it. That legislation which shall contribute most to the summoning into the service those best equipped for the duty to be performed and shall most effectively fence out the political claimant and the thriftless mendicant, should command our support. Competitive examination open to all is the only measure as yet proposed for the accomplishment of that end. It has already been tried with success in more than one branch of the service, and it is now proposed to make it compulsory in all within certain prescribed limits. Properly guarded and efficiently executed it cannot fail to sift out the incompetent and shiftless, and to effectually close the door against those who lead up political retainers for their pay, and seek to prostitute the public service to the liquidation of political debts. Political opinions or services cannot find place in a competitive examination, properly conducted, or influence its result. Under it they cannot be the basis of appointments, and therefore will cease to be the source of contention and bitterness. It will take away from the Executive the annoyance and labor and distraction of adjudicating petty political claims and distributing political favors, for none making the one or seeking the other can reach him through this channel. The mephytic breath of the office-broker will no longer poison the atmosphere of the Executive Mansion or the Department corridors, for his calling will be gone, and his craft will cease to mislead.

This is the purpose of the pending measure and of that heretofore introduced by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] Neither introduces any new and untried element into the civil service, nor authorizes any method of administration, beyond minor details, not before known to it. The force of each bill is spent in making obligatory and compelling by positive law the adoption throughout the civil service of methods of administration which the law has for the last ten years authorized but not required, and which have been partially adopted in some parts of the service, with a hope for improvement more than realized by the results.

The bill introduced by me, now before the Senate, is not designed to antagonize the one already in committee offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] but taking that bill as a basis, it proposes some changes in the methods of carrying out its provisions and at the same time to widen its scope and application. These would ordinarily, however, come before the Senate as amendments to that bill. But the adoption of any one of them would necessitate so many changes of phraseology in other parts of the bill that a new draft would become a necessity. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] will therefore not consider me as an antagonist, but as a coadjutor; not as striving to take from him or those whose views his bill represents any portion of their justly earned commendation for its production and for the work which has led to it, but as a contributor to the same great endeavor.

The amendments to the bill of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] introduced in the bill now before the Senate, work material, and I think important, changes in the methods of its administration, changes which in my judgment are essential to success. I will briefly state the most important of these and leave their wisdom to the consideration of the committee and the Senate.

The bill introduced by me is an endeavor to provide in the most plain, simple, and direct manner possible for filling all vacancies which may hereafter occur in the civil service within certain limits, by a competitive examination open to all. Those limits comprise all not confirmed by the Senate whose annual compensation is not less than $900. The President is authorized in his discretion to apply such examination also to officials with a salary of less than $900. All custom-houses and post-offices and all other bureaus and offices in which twenty persons or more are employed, are embraced within the provisions of the bill. Entrance into the service is to be at the lowest grade, and competitive examinations to fill vacancies in the higher grades are to be first of those within the service only, and afterwards, if no one from within the service is found fit, the examinations are to be open to the public at large.

Appointments are to be made from the three highest upon the list of such competitive examinations for a probationary term of six months, and afterward, upon approved qualifications, the appointment is to be made full and unconditional. These competitive examinations are to be conducted by the department or bureau where the vacancy is to be filled and by three persons holding office therein, to be designated for that purpose by the President, and under rules and regulations approved and published by him, so framed as to best disclose the fitness of the applicant for the service sought. The President is also required to fix the times and places for such examinations which may be in the States where the applicants reside or in the bureau where the service is to be performed, or both. No political opinion or affiliation of the applicant shall be disclosed by him or inquired into on such examination. In addition to these positive requirements, the bill reaffirms all the discretionary authority of the President over the civil service contained in section 1753 of the Revised Statutes, to establish any other rules and regulations the good of the service may require, thus enabling him to provide for competitive or other examinations of those who are to perform special service not provided for in the bill, and to meet any other exigency which may arise in determining the capacity and fitness of appointments to office, in any manner not in conflict with the bill itself, which may be deemed necessary.

The rules and regulations governing all examinations in each branch of the service are to be first approved by the President and then by him published to the world, that what is done, and how it is done, may be known of all men. This will best secure the adaptation of the rules to the character of the service for which the examination is to be made, and at the same time all that unity of general aim and purpose and uniformity of procedure which the great diversity in the nature of the duties to be discharged will permit. The one directing head should be the Executive, from whom all appointments directly or indirectly emanate. All detail under such direction should be required at the hands of those in charge of the particular branch of service having vacancies to be filled and responsible for the results attained.

These are the general features of the methods by which this bill proposes to apply open competitive examination as a test of fitness. It may require amendment in its details. Whenever the discretion of the Executive to broaden or direct to specialties the principles of the bill is needed in cases not expressly provided for in the bill it expressly invokes that discretion by calling to its aid section 1753 of the Revised Statutes, which is in these words:

The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as may best promote the efficiency thereof, and ascertain the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of service into which he seeks to enter; and for this purpose he may employ suitable persons to conduct such inquiries, and may prescribe their duties, and establish regulations for the conduct of persons who may receive appointments in the civil service.

With the positive requirements of this bill before us and the discretionary authority contained in this section every exigency within the scope of legislative regulation of the method of appointments to the civil service will be sufficiently provided for.

The bill creates no new office, and involves no new expenditure. The duties it imposes pertain to the good management of the business in each of the Departments, and should therefore be performed in and by the Departments respectively. No complicated or cumbersome machinery clogs or retards its operations, for it is simple in its action. It puts no new obstacle or distance between those responsible for the character of the work to be done and the agents to be selected for its performance, but on the contrary it draws closer together in all the relations of authority and dependence those who are to determine the selection and those who are to demonstrate their own fitness for the places they seek or hold. Under this bill no independent power, a stranger to the Department in which the service is to be performed, can intervene between him who is to perform it and him who is held responsible for the manner in which it may be done, with power to hear complaints, intercept orders, revoke rules, or in any way to turn or weaken the force of that authority without which there can be neither order nor efficiency.

By confining the selection to one of the three highest on the list after competitive examination, it reduces to the minimum all possible opportunity for any other influence than search for the best to control that selection, and by bringing within its requirements all custom-houses and post-offices having not less than twenty appointees, and all clerks below class 1, with salaries not less than $900 it will rescue from the malign influences of partisan politics a much larger number of appointees than any other measure yet proposed.

This bill proposes no new or untried experiment. The test of competitive examination, and the very methods of its application required in all Departments and bureaus by this bill, have governed the entrance and continuance in office of the eight hundred men required to discharge the duties pertaining to the New York post-office since 1874. So exactly are the methods there adopted reproduced in this bill that were it to become a law I do not know that it would work a single change in the administration of that office. There can be no higher commendation of the principles and methods of this bill. Each one of that large body of employés enters the service at the lowest grade through a competitive examination open to all, and rises, if at all, through all the grades by a like examination open to all employés. The examiners are appointed from among those there employed; the rules which govern them are framed there, and all is supervised and directed by the head of the office himself, with no new official to carry on or take part in the process, and without a dollar's additional expense, but with a result which is a marvel and a model. The public have never been served as well as now, and are served at a vastly less relative expense, and with a safety, accuracy, and dispatch, never before equaled in the postal service. Political importunity has ceased to besiege the appointing power for place, and the dead-beat has turned his back upon the New York post-office. What I have said in respect of the post-office in New York can be as truthfully said of the New York custom-house since 1879. And these are the only places in all the public service where the applicants for office do not equal the vacancies to be filled.

The bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] superadds to this plain, simple, direct, and inexpensive method of applying competitive examination within and by the Departments and bureaus themselves, an independent, central supervising board of control consisting of five commissioners, to be appointed by the President without the advice and consent of the Senate, with no fixed tenure of office, and removable only by impeachment, or after an arraignment in writing filed by the President in the Department of State—a restriction upon the Executive power of removal never before attempted. Three of these commissioners are to receive an annual salary of $3,500 and expenses, and the other two an uncertain compensation, which may be more or less than that sum. They are themselves to appoint a chief examiner with a similar tenure of office, and with a salary of $4,000 a year and his expenses. This commission is to have its permanent abiding place in the Interior Department in the city of Washington, and all the salaries and expenses of this commission are to be paid out of the Treasury by a permanent and perpetual appropriation provided for in the bill itself, like the permanent appropriation for the payment of interest on the public debt, while the salaries of all other officers of the Government, including that of the President himself, must be paid by annual appropriations. After the passage of the act neither Senate nor House can have further voice in the matter, except by impeachment of the commissioners; and the President himself, after he has appointed these commissioners, without the advice of the Senate, cannot reach them except by filing in writing in the Department of State an indictment against them.

This commission, when thus installed out of the reach of Congress or the President, except as I have stated, is to assume entire control of all examinations by which men are hereafter to enter or be promoted in the public service within the prescribed limits of the bill. They are to designate those who are to conduct all examinations for appointment in all Departments and bureaus, whether here at Washington or in the States, and of all applicants in the States for any kind or character of service in any other State in the Union or here at the capital, and are to "have control of such examinations" when made. They are to be a board of appeal to hear all complaints of any subordinate against his superior, in any matter where such subordinate and superior may differ as to the proper mode of administering the act, or the results which should follow from it, and may sit in judgment upon the official acts of heads of Departments and bureaus in whose appointment they have had no part.

The bill clothes these commissioners with another remarkable power. It authorizes them to appoint inferior officers, one with an annual salary of $4,000 a year and expenses, and another with an annual salary of $1,600 with duties prescribed by the statute and with a tenure determined in the statute itself, to be held even against the commissioners themselves except by procedure prescribed in the statute itself(!) But the Constitution declares that no law shall confer that authority upon any one "except the President alone, the courts or law, or the heads of Departments." It has been suggested that this provision escapes the constitutional limitation by the use of the word "employ" instead of the word "appoint." But I submit that the Constitution is not so easily eluded. If so, a general statute could easily authorize all bureau officers to "employ" those now holding appointments under them, and relieve the President and Senate and heads of Departments at once of all further trouble. But it is evident that the framer of the bill did not himself have in his mind any such distinction between the words "employ" and "appoint," for he uses them both in this bill to convey the same idea. He authorizes these commissioners to "employ" these officers in the first instance, but if their offices become vacant he authorizes them to "appoint" their successors; and he authorizes the President to "employ" the commissioners themselves, who, when they come to perform the extraordinary functions with which they are to be clothed, will do it in the belief that they are officers of the Government. The Supreme Court in the United States against Hartwell (6 Wallace, 185) decides him to be an officer whose position is a public employment, embracing the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties fixed by law. This is a description of the two inferior officers created in this bill, and the Constitution will not permit their appointment by these commissioners.

However congenial to the constitution and traditions of the British Empire, from whence it is borrowed, this outside independent power, supervising and controlling appointments, may be, I am satisfied that it can find no place in the institutions or habits of our people, and is at war with all our notions of the distribution of power, or the checks and balances which regulate its exercise. I have called it heretofore an imperium in imperio—a body in the State yet independent of it, with powers second only to those of the Chief Magistrate himself over the matters within its jurisdiction, yet responsible to no man for the manner of their exercise. I cannot define it better or express in fewer words my conviction that whatever good it may have accomplished elsewhere, it cannot succeed here. It is not an answer to these objections that good men will fill these places and that confidence must rest somewhere. I do not distrust the sincerity of the endeavor. But bad men may fill them, or good ones may mistake when left to fix their own limitations on the exercise of authority. The law must set up its own guards against the possibility of abuse. It will prove, in my judgment, if adopted, hurtful to the service by interposing an authority between those responsible for the performance of official duties, and the agents by whom they are performed, instead of drawing them closer together and making the influence and inspiration of the one reach the other unintercepted and unobstructed.

Mr. Lyon Playfair, the head of the British commission of inquiry, in his letter to the Chancellor of the Exchequer transmitting the results of their inquiries up to April, 1875, recognizes the necessity of those responsible for the discharge of official duties participating in the selection of the agents by whom the work is to be done. He says:

> We have already pointed out that it is an essential feature of our scheme that the selection we propose should be made only by the heads of departments, in concert with their principal officers, who are interested in and responsible for the working of the departments. We think this of the utmost importance and have no fear, with this precaution, of improper selection. It must be remembered that the requirements of the different offices are very different, and that whilst some posts require the very able men of whom you speak, for others, perhaps for the bulk of the service, a fair amount of ability combined with industry, good education, and good character, are sufficient qualifications. Our scheme is so framed as to meet both requirements.

The supervising commission seems to me to be as unnecessary as it is hurtful. Without it the whole system of open competitive examination has been already tried without friction or difficulty, and with marvelous success, upon a very large scale, in the New York post-office, and there can be no obstacle to its general application in the same manner and with every promise of like success.

I will notice at this time but one other objection to the bill of the Senator from Ohio. It is that after the open competitive examinations selections are then to be made "from among those graded highest," instead of "among the three highest," as provided in the bill now before the Senate. I do not know how broad a range of selection is secured under the words "from among those graded highest," but the restriction to the three highest is deemed necessary in order to reduce to a minimum all possibility of a determination of the selection, after examination, by political influences. A wider range would just to that extent open the door and invite the very influences the bill is designed to exclude. There are other defects in the bill, but they are in its details and not in its merits, and can be easily remedied by slight amendments, and I will not detain the Senate with them.

I have ventured this criticism of one or two features of the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] with some diffidence and great reluctance; for, being heartily in accord with him in purpose, and recognizing the great ability with which he is supporting the measure bearing his name, I have felt that it became me to question the soundness of different conclusions to which I have arrived, and to weigh well the considerations which have led to their utterance. It is in this spirit I have approached the subject; and it is only because I cannot escape the conclusion that those provisions of his bill to which I have called attention are in themselves hurtful, and will prove obstacles to complete success, that I have offered this substitute, which is free from the objections those features encounter.

Neither of these bills attempts to change or to limit in any way the tenure of office, because both proceed upon the reasonable theory that if it shall be made impracticable to secure the appointment of political or personal favorites to office when vacancies occur there will be an end of making vacancies for that purpose. Moreover, the immediate responsibility of the employed to those who appoint them to office, and who are the judges of their faithfulness in the performance of duty, which is the theory of the bill now before the Senate, must be coupled with the power to discharge at any time for incompetency or other disqualification. Therefore I do not now discuss the question of a fixed term of office. If experience should show that such a tenure is necessary to secure the ends sought by these bills, the discussion of the subject would then more properly arise.

Mr. President, there is a deep and widespread public conviction that action has been too long delayed. Recent events have greatly contributed to arouse those hitherto indifferent. No longer content with legislation which merely authorizes reform, there is coming to be a public sentiment potent enough to compel its enactment. While we have been sleeping the people have been thinking. The evil has assumed such gigantic proportions, and just concern for the safety of our institutions and of those who administer them has so taken hold of the public mind, that there can be no rest till a perfect cure shall bring back a feeling of security.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I have listened, as I am sure the Senate has, with great pleasure to the instructive and candid speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. I am rejoiced to find that upon the question of a reform in the subordinate civil service of the Government there is no difference between the Senator and myself, except as to the methods by which that purpose shall be accomplished. I am glad to see that in the fundamental methods of executing this reform, so generally demanded throughout the country, demanded as it is by the best intellect and the highest aspirations of the best men, there is no difference between the Senator's plan and my own, except merely as to the mode of putting into operation the system of competitive examination which we both consider essential.

I rise, not for the purpose of entering into any extended discussion with the Senator as to the criticisms that he has made upon the bill which I introduced. I rise simply for the purpose of correcting some errors into which he has fallen. I understood the Senator to say that after the commissioners provided by the bill should be appointed, there would be no means of getting rid of them except by impeachment. I call the Senator's attention to the first section of the bill, in which it is expressly provided that—

> The President may remove any commissioner for good cause, after allowing him an opportunity for making an explanation in answer to any charges against him, such cause to be stated in writing in the order of removal, which shall be filed with the Secretary of State; but no removal shall be made by reason of opinions or party affiliations.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will allow me to repeat what I said on that point, he will see how utterly I failed to make myself heard.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I said, "and removable only by impeachment, or after an arraignment in writing, filed by the President in the Department of State."

Mr. PENDLETON. The Senator doubtless is correct. The word "impeachment" fell with particular emphasis upon my ear, and I did not observe the alternative which he now states as having been a part of his sentence.

I may be permitted here to say that if the power of removal exists in the President, after a statement of the causes of removal filed in the office of the Secretary of State, there can be no hardship in the case. The objection of the Senator that the bill does not require the confirmation of these commissioners by the Senate can be easily removed; for if he, or any other person entitled to consideration by his study of the subject, desires to have such an amendment introduced, it can readily be accomplished. Then the power of appointment and removal will be placed exactly upon the ground on which the Constitution of the United States places it.

I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that extraordinary powers of employment or appointment were vested by the bill in these commissioners. In looking over the bill, I find that they have the authority to appoint or employ a chief examiner, stenographer, and copyists, and to designate throughout the country at all the offices where the examinations are to be held persons to conduct the examinations. I submit that that is not an extraordinary power of appointment. I submit that every law which has ever been passed by Congress creating a commission gives the power to appoint all necessary officers for the purpose of carrying out the objects of the commission, whatever they may be. In the bill which is now pending before the Senate to create a commission upon the subject of the tariff, the power is given, and we know it will be most liberally exercised, of appointing all the officers necessary for the purpose of attaining the objects committed to them. They will have stenographers, they will have copyists, they will have messengers, they will have every person necessary to the machinery of the commission, and they will employ experts undoubtedly to make investigations into the state of the various industries which will come within the scope of their examination. In every commission that ever has been appointed to do any public work, the Senate and House of Representatives have vested that commission with the power to employ agents, engineers, contractors, stenographers, clerks—every necessary agency—and this is not an extraordinary or unreasonable power, as I think, to be vested in them.

The Senator also, as I understood him, declared that after the passage of such a law the Congress of the United States would have no further power over the commission. It seemed to be his impression that in some way or other the Congress of the United States would limit its power to pass laws and to supervise the execution of the duties of the commission, because in the fourth section there is a provision that the costs and expenses, when duly verified by affidavit and stated and approved, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This whole subject is under the power of Congress. An appropriation would doubtless be made year by year for this purpose. If it should be found that in any wise the commission exercised unduly any of the powers given to it, it would be perfectly competent and perfectly easy for Congress to change the law, to impose additional restriction, to limit the appropriations, to make them annually, or to withold the appropriation entirely, as is suggested by my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] who sits beside me. In that provision I find nothing extraordinary and nothing warranting, as I think, the surprise manifested on the part of my friend from Massachusetts.

The Senator also found objection to the bill in that it did not limit to a certain number the choice of persons for the offices to be filled. He has chosen to select three. I consider that a very good number. I would probably be ready to assent to it without leaving the choice open to a larger range. I agree with him that just as you extend the scope of choice you allow an opportunity for all the evils of the present system to continue.

Mr. President, one single word further. The purpose of the commission is to secure uniformity of examination, to secure uniformity of the standard of excellence necessary to be attained to enter the public service. It is to secure uniformity throughout the different offices of the Federal Government, both as to the Departments in their relation to each other and the various offices in relation to themselves. It is that there shall be in New York, in New Orleans, in Cincinnati, in Boston, in Chicago, the same standard of excellence necessary to an entrance into the public service at the post-offices and the custom-houses at those various points. This is a consideration, as I think, of great importance. The moral power of the commission exercised over the chief officers and heads of the higher offices of the country, in the Executive Departments, in the great post-offices, in the custom-houses, will be immense in raising and maintaining that standard among the subordinate appointees, and would fully justify the additional expense of the five commissioners provided for in the bill.

The uniformity of standard of excellence is a very important matter. More important, however, even than that is the fact that examinations conducted under the supervision of the President of the United States, conducted under the advice of the heads of the Departments, conducted by the means of men who are familiar with the operations of the Departments here and of the great offices throughout the country, shall stand between the applicant and the appointing power; that the commission, with the concurrence of the President, shall have authority to fix the standard and have the examinations made; and that there shall be no power in those who make the appointments to lower the standard to meet the exigencies of particular cases. Those who are to be appointed must pass the examination of men not connected with the appointing power, but men whose duty it will be, under the supervision of the President of the United States, to provide fair and impartial examinations under every guard and guarantee that the ingenuity of man can devise; and then having selected the worthiest of the applicants, they submit the list to the head of the Department to make his choice. The head of the Department has then six months of probation and trial of the person who shall receive the appointment, to determine whether his qualifications of character, industry, manners, fitness, deftness, I think my friend from Massachusetts once said, for the place shall be equal to the place which he is called upon to fill.

I submit, therefore, that the appointment of such a commission is in the interest of impartiality, is in the interest of uniformity, is in the interest of the power which is to make the appointment, and is in the interest of the party who is to receive the appointment. I do not desire to go further into this matter to-day, as when a report shall be made from the committee to which the Senator has moved to refer the bill we shall undoubtedly have a better opportunity of entering into the details of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

THOMAS DOAK.

Mr. COCKRELL. I find that on Friday morning, before I reached the Senate Chamber, being detained on committee work, an adverse report was made by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, on the bill (S. No. 286) for the relief of Thomas Doak, and it was indefinitely postponed. I ask that the vote may be reconsidered and the bill placed on the Calendar, so that I may examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed will be considered, and it will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the question is put, the Chair will announce as the unfinished business the resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] in relation to the arrears of pensions act, which will be the order at half past one o'clock to-morrow, and upon which the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has the floor.

Mr. SLATER. I should like to state that last Thursday I gave notice that to-day I should call up the memorial presented by me in reference to the improvement of the Columbia River, in order to submit some remarks upon the subject. Not having been able to do so to-day, I give notice that to-morrow at half past one o'clock I shall call up the memorial which I have indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After one hour and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 813) to amend section 5254, title 63, Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the use of piers and cribs in the Mississippi River;

A bill (H. R. No. 3870) to change the name of the National Mechanics' Banking Association of New York to that of Wall Street National Bank; and

A bill (H. R. No. 4240) supplemental to the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the final expenses of the tenth census."

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 13, 1882.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

CHICAGO HARBOR.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the purpose of introducing a preamble and resolution for consideration at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The preamble and resolution will be read, when the Chair will ask if there be objection to their present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the Chicago Harbor has of recent date been encroached upon to such an extent as to warrant and call for the intervention (to protect the same) of the United States engineer officer in charge of the improvement of said harbor; and

Whereas an appeal has been taken to the honorable the Secretary of War to set aside and overrule said prohibition, or to secure permission to further invade and trespass upon said harbor:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the correspondence on file in his office, with such maps and tracings as may accompany the same, including the opinions given and the correspondence had with the Department of Justice relating to this subject, with a statement of facts. Also to transmit to the House of Representatives at his earliest convenience a statement showing the encroachments, if any, made upon the property and the submerged lands lying east of said property in which the United States claims title, located east of Michigan avenue and south of the Chicago River in the city of Chicago, State of Illinois, to what extent said property has been encroached upon, for what purpose, by whom, and by what authority.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the preamble and resolution just read?

There was no objection, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill relative to the distribution of the Geneva award, and to ask it be made a special assignment, and from day to day until disposed of, beginning Tuesday the 21st instant, after the morning hour, not to antagonize the apportionment or appropriation bills, and to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PAGE. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks for unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLS. Is it on the Private Calendar?

Mr. REED. It is now on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House, and I ask it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MILLS. But you do not propose to take up Friday for its consideration?

Mr. REED. I do not propose to antagonize the Private Calendar with it, or the apportionment or appropriation bills.

Mr. BUCKNER. I must object, and I wish to say in explanation——

Mr. REED. This is a matter of a good deal of importance, and, as gentlemen know, this special order has never heretofore been refused in the House, and I hope it will not be done now.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have no particular objection to this bill or any other, but we have adopted new rules, and since the adoption of those rules we never yet have gone through the calendars of the House. So long as we grant unanimous consent we probably never will go through them.

Mr. REED. This is not on the House Calendar, but in the Committee of the Whole, and I propose that the bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BUCKNER. I insist on my objection.

PIERS, ETC., IN THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to take up for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. No. 813) to amend section 5254, title 63, Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the use of piers and cribs in the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, and the Chair will then ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 5254, title 63, of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be amended by adding after the words "Mississippi River," in the first line of said section, the words "and the Saint Croix River in the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota."

Mr. WASHBURN. This is a bill of local importance. I hope there will be no objection, but that it will be put upon its passage at once.

Mr. HASKELL. I understood the gentleman's request was to take it up for consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN. Yes, that was my request.

Mr. HASKELL. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

Mr. WASHBURN. There is an approved report, which can be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 813) to amend section 5254, title 63, Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the use of piers and cribs in the Mississippi River, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The section of the statutes sought to be amended by this bill provides that "owners of saw-mills on the Mississippi River are authorized and empowered, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to construct piers or cribs in front of their mill property on the banks of the river for the protection of their mills and rafts against damage by floods and ice: Provided, however, That the piers or cribs so constructed shall not interfere with or obstruct the navigation of the river. And in case any pier or crib constructed under authority of this section shall at any time and for any cause be found to obstruct the navigation of the river, the Government expressly reserves the right to remove or direct the removal of it, at the cost and expense of the owners thereof."

The effect of this bill is merely to extend the provisions of the section to the Saint Croix River, an important tributary to the Mississippi.

Assuming that the provisions of the original section are proper, there seems to be no good reason why they should not be extended so as to embrace the Saint Croix River, especially as it is an important stream for lumbering, and with a large amount of saw-mill property located upon it that would be benefited by such provisions.

Your committee would therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

There was no objection, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF GROUNDS SOUTH OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. URNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 30 for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The title of the resolution will be read, after which objections will be asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. No. 30) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol, along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the present consideration of that bill.

Mr. HUBBELL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. URNER. If the gentleman will just hear me for a moment, I think he will withdraw his objection. It is very important that this matter should have immediate consideration.

Mr. ATKINS. I think it is too important a bill to pass without more careful examination.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—COOK VS. CUTTS.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution, which I am directed to report from the Committee on Elections, and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the contested-election case of John C. Cook against M. E. Cutts, from the sixth Congressional district of Iowa, have had the same under consideration, and upon a memorial and request made by the contestant for leave to take further testimony in said case, and upon sufficient cause being shown in the judgment of your committee why the same should be granted, beg leave to report for the adoption of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the contestant be granted further time to take testimony in this contest upon the following terms and conditions, namely:

First. Upon giving contestee notice of time and place and names of witnesses proposed to be examined not less than thirty days, exclusive of day of service.

Second. Contestant shall then have ten days to take the testimony hereafter mentioned.

Third. Contestee shall then have fifteen days in reply.

Fourth. Contestant shall then have five days in which to take testimony in rebuttal; all periods allowed being exclusive of Sundays and holidays.

The testimony of contestant shall be confined exclusively to the examination of witnesses who may now be in possession of the books and pay-rolls mentioned in contestant's subpœna duces tecum, heretofore served on W. A. McNeill, who testified on the 9th day of March, 1881, in this case as contestant's witness, and one Major Shoemake, who is mentioned in contestant's memorial as having knowledge of the same facts, which testimony has, as alleged, been discovered by him since his time expired to close his testimony, and which by the use of reasonable diligence contestant alleges he could not have ascertained in the time allowed by law.

When this testimony is taken the contestant may then take evidence tending to show for whom any illegal voter voted which may have been disclosed by the testimony first herein allowed to be taken. All the evidence taken shall be directed and confined to the point above indicated.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, the resolution explains itself, and I do not want to occupy the time of the House in discussing it. There is no minority report from the committee. I therefore ask the immediate adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN CITIZENS IN PERSIA.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a privileged report. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back the following resolution of inquiry in relation to the protection of American citizens in Persia, and recommend its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is requested to furnish to the House of Representatives, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest, a copy of the correspondence on file in his office relating to the perils and difficulties in which American citizens, missionaries at Oroomiah, Persia, were involved by the late Koordish war; and also a copy of the correspondence with the British Government which resulted in the intervention by that government for their protection, and any additional information he may deem proper with reference to the propriety of establishing diplomatic relations with the Government of Persia to secure a better protection and consideration for American citizens and American industries in that country.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENSUS DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Mr. Speaker, on the 28th of January a bill was passed, having been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, providing for the payment of the volunteer force employed in the Census Department. It has been found that the bill is not so worded as to allow payment to those who hold the certificates, having advanced money upon them to the employés, and who hold three-fourths of these certificates for themselves, the other quarter being payable to the employés. Consequently neither they nor the employés can receive any payment under the bill as passed.

The matter has been referred to the Census Committee, and I am directed to report a supplemental bill, which I now present, to provide for this contingency.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent for its present consideration?

Mr. PRESCOTT. I ask that the bill be read, so that members can understand its object, and see that it protects the employés as well as those who hold the certificates.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire present consideration?

Mr. PRESCOTT. That is the desire of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. We had better have the bill read, subject to objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act supplemental to the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the final expenses of the tenth census."

And be it further enacted, That notwithstanding the provisions of section 3477 of the Revised Statutes, the compensation authorized by act approved January 28, 1882, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the final expenses of the tenth census," to be paid to those persons who have rendered services as volunteers, may be made to the assignee or assignees in writing of the amounts payable to such persons respectively or may be made to such person or persons as shall have received in writing and now hold a power of attorney to collect, have, and receive the said compensation or any part thereof on the certificates issued therefor by the Department of the Interior to the amount advanced by such assignee or person holding such right or power of attorney to such volunteer, together with interest or discount upon such advancement not exceeding the rate of 10 per cent. per annum.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a report accompanying the bill? Before objecting, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRESCOTT] a question, if I am permitted. That is whether the practical effect of this bill is to give in addition to the employés the amount which they found it necessary to pay to persons who advanced the money?

Mr. PRESCOTT. It does not provide for any such thing.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I have no objection.

The bill (H. R. No. 4240) was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PRESCOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF EULOGIES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I desire to ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution (H. R. No. 89) to print the eulogies delivered in the House of Representatives upon the late Fernando Wood, now on the Speaker's table, with Senate amendments be taken therefrom, and that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in. The joint resolution has been amended in the Senate so as to include the eulogies on the late Senators Carpenter and Burnside.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, and the Senate amendments were read as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert these words:

"That there be printed 12,000 copies respectively of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Fernando Wood, a Representative from the State of New York, Matthew H. Carpenter, a Senator from the State of Wisconsin, and Ambrose E. Burnside, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island, of each of which 4,000 shall be for the Senate, and 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed portraits of the three above named, Wood, Carpenter, and Burnside, to accompany their respective eulogies; and for the purpose of defraying the expense of engraving and printing the said portraits the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Amend the title so as to read:

"A joint resolution to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Fernando Wood, Matthew H. Carpenter, and Ambrose E. Burnside."

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

Mr. MARSH. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to report the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report to this House what legislation, if any, is necessary to so increase the efficiency of the Adjutant-General's Office as to secure more prompt attention to requests for information made by the Pensions Committee and other authorized persons respecting the military history of persons applying for relief to Congress.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. MARSH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PEELLE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. No. 937, which is a bill empowering the Postmaster-General to delegate to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General authority in his stead to sign warrants. It is the same authority as that conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury under sections 246 and 247 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I object.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. As the regular order, this being Monday, the Chair, as required by the rules, will now call the States and Territories in alphabetical order for the presentation of bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference. Under this call joint and concurrent resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures can be presented and appropriately referred; and resolutions of inquiry directed to heads of Executive Departments are in order for reference to the appropriate committees, which latter resolutions are to be reported to the House within one week.

NUMBER OF MEMBERS IN HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair the proper reference would be to the Committee on the Census, which now has the subject under consideration.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. This has relation to the election of members, and should, I think, go to the Committee on Elections. I have looked into the question, and similar bills have been referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion the bill should go to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. But the rule says all subjects relating to the election of members should go to the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it should go to the Committee on the Census, because that committee not only has that subject before it but has reported bills involving the same question.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I beg leave to differ with the Speaker in this regard, because the new rules provide specifically that all subjects relating to the election of members shall go to the Committee on Elections. And no matter what the practice may have been hitherto it seems to me a liberal or a strict construction of that rule would send any bill relating to the election of members to the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair adheres to the opinion it should go to the Committee on the Census.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I move this particular bill go to the Committee on Elections. I ask that the rule be read.

The SPEAKER. The rule will be read.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Read the first clause of Rule XI.

The Clerk read as follows:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz: Subjects relating,

1. to the election of members: to the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to refer the bill introduced by him to the Committee on Elections, the Chair having held that under the rules the bill should be referred to the Committee on the Census, that committee having already, as the Chair understands, this subject before it. The Chair is also of opinion that matters affecting the title of a member to his seat are those which are to be referred to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER'S motion was disagreed to.

The bill was then referred to the Committee on the Census, and ordered to be printed.

JASPER HANSON.

Mr. BRAGG introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4412) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle an equitable claim of Jasper Hanson, growing out of the rebuilding and repairs of the revenue cutter Andrew Johnson, on Lake Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

FLOWAGE OF LANDS—LAKE WINNEBAGO, ETC.

Mr. BRAGG also submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House the aggregate amount of the awards made for damages against the United States prior to 1878 by reason of the flowage of lands upon the borders of Lake Winnebago, Wolf River, and Fox River, occasioned by the maintenance of the dam at Menasha, at the foot of Lake Winnebago in the State of Wisconsin, in aid of the Government improvement, so called, of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers.

Also, to report the amount of money paid out for legal services by the United States in contesting the claims of persons who allege their lands have been injured by such flowage.

Also, the number of suits now pending against the United States by reason of such flowage.

Also, whether any of the judgments or awards in favor of persons injured by such flowage have been paid, and, if not, why they have not been paid; and whether it is contemplated by the officers of the Law Department to recommend such payment; and, if it is not proposed to pay the parties injured, to state the reasons therefor, but, if it is proposed to pay, to state why the recommendation of payment has been delayed and when it is proposed to make the same.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CODE.

Mr. BRAGG also submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Be it resolved, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to furnish, as soon as may be, for the information of this House, in respect to the bill No. 1295, pending, entitled "An act to establish a municipal code for the District of Columbia," and particularly with reference to sections Nos. 177, 178, and 184 of the said code, and now on the Calendar of the House—

First. A specific and detailed statement of all assessments for special improvements of the streets, avenues, and alleys in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, where the improvements for which said assessments were made and levied were not "completed" (at the time of such assessment) in accordance with the first section of an act of the late Legislative Assembly, approved August 10, 1871, entitled "An act prescribing the mode of the assessment for special improvements and providing for the collection thereof."

Second. And if the said commissioners, or their predecessors in office, were advised by their respective attorneys for the said district that such assessments were "illegal" or "void" where the "improvements" were not "completed" in accordance with said first section of said act of the said Legislative Assembly, to furnish copies of such opinion.

Third. And if the said commissioners, or their predecessors in office, after such opinions were rendered as aforesaid, issued any tax-lien certificates in respect to such assessments so declared by the attorneys aforesaid to be "illegal" or "void" against the property of citizens within said District of Columbia, then, and in that event, said commissioners are directed to report their reasons therefor, and the cases in which such tax-lien certificates were so issued, and the names of the owners of property affected thereby, and the cases in which payments have been made thereunder.

Fourth. A detailed and specific statement of all real estate in said District which has been sold or conveyed by said commissioners, or their predecessors in office, for alleged non-payment of assessments for special improvements, so called, classifying in such statement sales, certificates of sales, or conveyances by virtue of said assessments on "incomplete" and "complete" improvements; likewise stating time of sale, to whom sold, and at what prices; the names of parties holding certificates under such sales; also all cases in which such sales were made before such assessments were finally "revised and corrected" as required by law. Also, all cases in which such assessments were sold and assigned by said District of Columbia, or any officer thereof, before such final "revision and correction," and to whom such sales or assignments were made. Also, the names of all persons, or banking associations, or corporations who have received certificates representing the amount of the reduction of such assessments after such final "revision and correction," commonly called "drawbacks." Also, all cases in which such persons, or banking associations, or corporations have refused to receive or credit the amount of such certificates, or "drawbacks," on such original assessment certificates received or held by them, and the reasons assigned therefor.

Fifth. What amount of the arrears of general taxes on real estate, mentioned on page 4 of the annual report of said commissioners to Congress for the year ending June 30, 1880, and also for the year 1881, held by and claimed to be due to parties other than the District of Columbia.

WAGON-ROAD IN ARIZONA.

Mr. OURY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4413) to provide for the construction of a wagon-road across the Mogollon Mountains in the Territory of Arizona; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORIAL PRISON IN ARIZONA.

Mr. OURY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4414) making appropriation for the completion of the Territorial prison at Yuma, in the Territory of Arizona; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT TUCSON, ARIZONA.

Mr. OURY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4415) making appropriation for the erection of a building in the city of Tucson, Territory of Arizona, for custom-house, post-office, and other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

ARTESIAN WELLS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. OURY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4416) to provide for the boring of artesian wells in the Territory of Arizona; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LUTHER RIPLEY.

Mr. RICH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4417) to rerate the pension of Luther Ripley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES T. KELLEHER.

Mr. BROWNE (by request) introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) authorizing the President to place the name of James T. Kelleher, late a second assistant engineer in the United States Navy, on the retired list of the Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES L. CAMP.

Mr. HENDERSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4418) for the relief of James L. Camp; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM R. GIBSON.

Mr. KNOTT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4419) for the relief of William R. Gibson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PADUCAH, KENTUCKY.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4420) to establish a port of delivery at Paducah, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EDWIN DE LEON.

Mr. KING introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4421) for the relief of Edwin De Leon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KING also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4422) for the relief of Edwin De Leon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BURKS FITZGERALD.

Mr. KING also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4423) for the relief of Burks Fitzgerald; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARIA JOHNSON.

Mr. KING also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4424) for the relief of Maria Johnson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN STARK.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4425) for the relief of John Stark; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES F. HAYES.

Mr. HOLMAN also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4426) for the relief of Charles F. Hayes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HOLMAN also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the House a statement of claims filed under the second and third sections of an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," approved July 4, 1864, and under amendments thereof, as follows:

1. The number of all claims filed in his Department under said sections and amendments thereof, and the number filed from each State and Territory.
2. The aggregate amount of all claims so filed.
3. The number and aggregate amount of the claims allowed, and the aggregate amount disallowed.
4. The number of claims still pending, and the aggregate amount of such claims.

STARLEN TURNER.

Mr. PEELLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4427) for the relief of Mrs. Starlen Turner; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MARY M'CARTY.

Mr. WAIT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4428) restoring a pension to Mary McCarty; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WALL STREET NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. FLOWER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3870) to change the name of the National Mechanics' Banking Association of New York to that of Wall Street National Bank, and that the bill be now taken up and put on its passage.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the House proceeded to consider it. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of the National Mechanics' Banking Association of New York, a corporation transacting business in the city, county, and State of New York, shall be changed to Wall Street National Bank, whenever the board of directors of said banking association shall accept the new name by resolution of the said board, and cause a copy of said resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act, and that all the expenses incident to such change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by said bank.

SEC. 2. That the debts, dividends, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the said National Mechanics' Banking Association shall devolve upon and inure to the said Wall Street National Bank whenever such change of name is effected.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as in any manner to release the said banking association from any liability or affect any action or proceeding in law in which said association may be or become a party or interested.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FLOWER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the vote to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' HOME, ERIE, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. BAYNE, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic and the soldiers and sailors' convention at Williamsport, Pennsylvania, January 25 and 26, 1882, unanimously favoring the passage of House bill No. 1440 for the establishment of a soldiers' home at Erie, Pennsylvania; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA.
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Assistant Adjutant-General's Office, No. 1037 Chestnut Street,
Philadelphia, February 11, 1882.

SIR: At the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic of Pennsylvania at Williamsport on July 25 and 26, comprising seven hundred delegates, representing every section of our State, a resolution was unanimously passed favoring the early passage of bill No. 1440, introduced by Hon. L. F. WATSON, for the establishment of a soldiers' home upon the site of the marine hospital at Erie, upon the condition that the State should cede to the United States all interest in the lands and buildings, the home to be for the accommodation of impoverished and destitute soldiers who are now objects of charity, but who are excluded from the benefits of the national homes as now established because they were not discharged from the service by reason of wounds or disability. And we were directed to respectfully ask your earnest and active support of the above bill that it may become a law during the present session of Congress.

Yours, very respectfully,

J. M. VANDERSLICE,
Department Commander.
THOMAS J. STEWART,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Hon. T. M. BAYNE, M. C., Washington, D. C.

HEADQUARTERS SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME COMMITTEE,
Erie, Pennsylvania, February 6, 1882.

The following resolution was unanimously passed, amid the wildest enthusiasm, at the veteran soldiers and sailors' convention at Williamsport, Pennsylvania, January 26, 1882, there being present five hundred and fifty delegates representing two hundred and thirty-two posts of the Grand Army of the Republic:

Resolved, That this encampment heartily indorse the bill now pending in Congress, the object of which is to establish a soldiers' home in Erie, Pennsylvania, for the benefit of those soldiers and sailors who have become disabled since the close of the war and are objects of public charity. And the department officers are directed to put in proper shape the action of the encampment on the subject, and send the same to all the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, and urge them to put forth every effort to secure the immediate passage of the bill.

J. H. WELSH,
Chairman Soldiers and Sailors' Home Committee.
J. C. HILTON, Secretary.

LA GRANGE SYNODICAL COLLEGE.

Mr. MANNING. On Friday last the petition of the trustees of the La Grange Synodical College was reported back adversely by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HALL] from the Committee on War Claims, and was laid on the table. I have spoken with the gentleman from New Hampshire who made this report; and I now ask unanimous consent that the petition be taken from the table and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

COMMITTEE ON VENTILATION AND ACOUSTICS.

Mr. RANDALL, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That a select committee of seven members be appointed, to whom shall be referred all matters relating to the ventilation and acoustics of the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF COLORED EMIGRANTS.

Mr. HASKELL. The bill (H. R. No. 2341) for the relief of colored emigrants has been returned from the Senate with a slight amendment and is now on the Speaker's table. I ask unanimous consent that it be taken from the table and the amendment concurred in.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it now in order to move to go to business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Not until after the call of committees for reports.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

After the word "faith," in line 3, insert the words "prior to the 1st day of January, 1883;" so that the clause will read:

"All clothing and other articles, being charitable contributions, or the avails of charitable contributions, imported in good faith prior to the 1st day of January, 1883, for the relief or aid of colored persons," &c.

There being no objection, the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HASKELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. ANDERSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back as a substitute for House bills 711, 867, 1234, 1350, 2645, and 2977, a bill (H. R. No. 4429) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture; which was read a first and second time referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. HATCH, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 896) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious or contagious diseases among domestic animals; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I am directed by the Committee on the Census to report back the following resolution, on which I ask for action at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the final voting upon the first section of the apportionment bill, the vote shall be first taken upon the bill or amendment providing for the largest number of members, each bill or amendment providing for a lesser number to be taken up in their order and voted on until a number shall be adopted, which shall be the number adopted by the House for the number of members of the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER and Mr. PAGE objected.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. MURCH. I ask by unanimous consent to present a preamble and resolution in order that they may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I object.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, and it is to know what the regular order is.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 115, noes 6.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Now I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the unfinished business coming over from Thursday last, which is the bill (H. R. No. 3550) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the Census when they intend to press a vote on the apportionment bill,—how long general debate is to last?

Mr. PRESCOTT. I am directed by the committee to say to the House that at the end of six hours of debate from this time the previous question will be called.

Mr. SPRINGER. Cannot we have it sooner than that?

Mr. PRESCOTT. It cannot be made any sooner and allow the members of the committee who have provided for speaking to occupy their time. It would be unjust and unfair to the members of the committee and to the House to call it any sooner.

Mr. PAGE. Why cannot the debate on the apportionment bill be limited to two hours, and why cannot we agree that at the expiration of that time the previous question shall be called?

Mr. PRESCOTT. Oh, no!

Mr. PAGE. In entire respect to the members of the committee, but believing this bill has had three or four hours of discussion already, that to prolong it as suggested by the gentleman from New York would carry it over to Wednesday of this week, I shall move that it be closed at some early hour to-morrow.

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman from California I wish to say that I do not think the proposition of the gentleman from New York will extend the debate beyond to-morrow, but we might as well understand that to-morrow evening there shall be a vote taken on this subject.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move as an amendment that the general debate be closed and a vote be called on the bill at half past three to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. PAGE. At the suggestion of members of the committee I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York if it is understood we are to have a vote to-morrow at half past three.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Say four.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California accepts the amendment, and the proposition now before the House is that debate on the apportionment bill be closed at half past three to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. PAGE. All debate.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If I understand the motion of the chairman of the committee, it is to close general debate while the motion of the gentleman from California is to close all debate. Now, there are many amendments in reference to which not a syllable has been said in the debate so far, and members offering those amendments should have the opportunity to discuss them. I have one which I wish to discuss. I call the attention of the House to this fact, whether it is the most expedient thing in the world to close all debate on further amendments. Close general debate, if you wish to do that, but let us reserve to ourselves a certain amount of ordinary liberty in dealing with a question of greater importance for ten years to come than any before the House. I do not wish to see any gag-law tried on us in that respect.

Mr. PAGE. Every amendment will be discussed by the time the debate is closed, and before the vote is reached. It seems to me if we are going to act on this bill we ought to close all debate upon it and go to voting at half past three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, before action is taken upon this matter, I think, in justice to various gentlemen in the House, some proposition looking to the consideration of amendments which may be prepared should be agreed to. For that reason I desire to submit an amendment to the effect that gentlemen offering amendments to the apportionment bill shall be allowed at least one hour in which such amendments may be offered and advocated in speeches of not exceeding ten minutes. I have myself prepared an amendment with a good deal of care which I desire to submit to the House, and on it I should like to have the opportunity of presenting my views, as I think the amendment is worthy of consideration. I am not a member of the committee, and would therefore be debarred from the opportunity of submitting my views upon the matter, although as a member of the last Census Committee I have given this subject careful consideration, unless some such arrangement is reached. The debate which has taken place up to this time has been, I believe, almost entirely confined to members of the committee, and I have placed myself on record as desiring to obtain the floor upon this bill. I ask, therefore, the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] to so modify his motion as to permit an hour after the general debate is closed in which amendments may be offered and advocated in speeches of not exceeding ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky make a motion to that effect?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. If it be necessary I will make a motion. I hope the gentleman from California will, however, accept the suggestion.

Mr. PAGE. With the consent of the gentleman from New York that general debate shall close at half past two o'clock to-morrow, I should be willing to accept the modification of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Then I make that motion in the nature of an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment to the pending amendment, that at three and one-half o'clock to-morrow, after general debate shall have closed, one hour be allowed, during which time amendments may be offered and debate allowed thereon not exceeding ten minutes on any one amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Why may not this be agreed to, and take the last hour, from two and a half to three and a half o'clock, for such amendments?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I have no objection if that can be arranged in that way.

Mr. BRIGGS. I wish to ask a question in this connection. Here is a motion to limit this debate. Now, supposing this motion is passed, I would like to know what gentlemen are to be assigned the floor. I suppose, of course, the members of the Committee on the Census will have the preference. If you limit the debate, and they claim the floor, everybody else will be excluded. Now, sir, I am anxious for a vote upon this question. It is one of the most important subjects that we shall be called upon to decide during this Congress; but I am opposed to this attempt to drive this measure through the House under the whip and under the spur. I propose to resist it until gentlemen who are interested and whose States are to be sacrificed can have an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. PAGE. By the consent of the gentleman from New York I modify my motion, and move that general debate be closed at three o'clock to-morrow, and that one hour be given for the consideration, as in Committee of the Whole, of amendments under the five-minute debate.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to make a suggestion.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. I make the point of order that debate cannot be limited in the House by a motion at all. The only method by which debate can be cut off under the rules and practice of the House is by the previous question; and a motion or resolution to limit debate to any particular period is entirely out of order and unknown to our rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that debate cannot be limited by a motion in the House. The Chair is inclined to think that unless the motion to limit debate be adopted by unanimous consent, the point of order is well taken.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Then I object to limiting debate.

Mr. BELFORD. I was about to suggest to the House, Mr. Speaker, that it seems to me there has been enough general debate on this question. The House has been engaged for three or four days in general debate, and now it seems to me a proposition which would enable this matter to be discussed under the five-minute rule, in order to mature the various amendments submitted, is a matter of vital importance. The greater portion of the time occupied in this debate has been occupied by the members of the committee themselves. I hope, therefore, an agreement will be arrived at by which general debate may be closed and a reasonable time allowed for the discussion of amendments by the members of the House generally. I think it would be well to consider all these amendments under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. What time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. BELFORD. I suggest that at half past one o'clock to-morrow the general debate shall close, and then that the bill be considered under the five-minute rule for two hours, after which a vote shall be taken.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed at one o'clock and thirty minutes to-morrow, and that after that the bill be considered under the five-minute rule, as in Committee of the Whole. This will require unanimous consent.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I object. Under direction of the committee, I give notice to the House that I shall call the previous question upon the bill and amendments after six hours' debate.

Mr. BELFORD. Then if there is any rule in this House which will permit this discussion to be conducted in such a manner as to place the House at the mercy of a committee and cut off all debate, I hope the previous question will be voted down. I desire to say that there are many gentlemen on this side of the House who have had no opportunity whatever to discuss this. We want an opportunity to be heard under the five-minute rule, and we submit a fair proposition upon the subject.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to move that we consider this bill as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Then I object.

Mr. RYAN. I demand the regular order.

Mr. PAGE. Could not the House by a majority vote agree to consider this as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. That would change the rule, and would not be in order.

Mr. PAGE. Is it in order to move the previous question on this bill now?

The SPEAKER. Whenever any gentleman has the floor properly for that purpose it would be in order. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. TILLMAN,] when the House adjourned on a former day, was entitled to the floor, and except for the purpose of these preliminary suggestions the Chair recognizes that gentleman for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Would it be in order to move that all general debate be closed at three o'clock to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has indicated it is of opinion that would require unanimous consent.

Mr. TILLMAN. I yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. WELLBORN.]

Mr. MULDROW. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MULDROW. Is it permissible for any gentleman to move the previous question at any time before the chairman of the committee chooses to do so?

The SPEAKER. If a gentleman had the floor, not for the purpose of debate merely, but for the purpose of controlling the bill, he might make that motion.

Mr. MULDROW. Is there any rule which prohibits a member from obtaining the floor for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. A gentleman might obtain the floor for debate, but not so as to control the bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] is recognized.

Mr. WELLBORN. The third paragraph of the second section of the first article of the Constitution provides that—

> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers.

And further, that—

> The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years.

The end contemplated by these two provisions, a decennial redistribution of that part of the political power of the Government exercised and voiced by this House, ought to be the result of three processes.

Named in logical sequence, they are these:

First, the fixing of the total number of Representatives with sole reference to an efficient exercise of the functions which belong to the House, and a due preservation of the representative principle upon which it is founded.

Second, the ascertainment of the ratio of Representatives to population.

Third, the distribution of the number of Representatives thus fixed on the ratio thus ascertained among the States.

These processes succeed each other in the order named by a continuous logical relation, and any change in the order will break the series and tend to vicious consequences.

It has been maintained that the first thing to do in an apportionment is to fix the ratio of Representatives to population, i. e. the number of inhabitants entitled to 1 Representative, then divide the whole population of the United States by this ratio and let the quotient be the total number of Representatives. The objection to this plan is that it makes the size of the House a pure mathematical result, when it ought to be a fact determined independently of all calculations based on numbers. The considerations which should determine the size of the House are, reasonable adaptability to the functions it is designed to perform, and a due preservation of the representative principle upon which it is founded. These considerations are more likely to control when the number of Representatives is fixed in the outset. It is said, however, that a different practice prevailed for the first fifty years of the Government. In support of this assertion a brief review of the matter by the late President Garfield is quoted.

General Garfield epitomizes this history in a pargraph wherein he says, (December 9, 1869, page 39:)

> I desire to say to the House in regard to the whole matter of representation, that there are just two ways in which the Government has settled the question. For the first fifty years of the Government it was settled by fixing, not the number of members of the House, but the number of population which should be entitled to a Representative; and when that was fixed dividing the total population by that number and letting the size of the House be the result of that division. For fifty years the size of the House of Representatives was so determined. In 1840 a change was made in that respect, after a long and most searching debate. The result of that debate was that they fixed the number of members of the House, and finding the total population, divided that by the number of members and got the basis for each Representative.

While the form and phraseology of the several apportionment acts up to and including that of 1832 appear to confirm this statement, the debates in both Houses show the size of the House was never in fact left to the chances of numerical calculation, but was always determined largely on other considerations. Whatever may have been the practice up to the act of 1832, it is sure that since that time the practice has been to fix the number of Representatives as the first step in the apportionment. And this is the natural order of proceeding. The rule for apportioning Representatives is the same as for direct taxes. Suppose an emergency should arise, requiring the imposition of direct taxes, and a Secretary of the Treasury, without inquiring into the amount of revenue needed, should submit to Congress a plan that from every given number of people a specified tax should be collected, and that the aggregate of the taxes thus collected should be the accepted result whether greater or less than the needed revenue. What would be said of such a plan and of such a secretary? That the former was supreme folly and that the official submitting it was not only incompetent to the management of the financial affairs of a great nation, but unfit for drudgery at the crank of a lottery wheel, because he would be liable to turn it in the wrong direction. The true method is the same both in matters of direct taxes and representation; as in the former the first thing to do is to ascertain the amount of revenue the Government needs, and then distribute the burden according to constitutional rule, so, in the latter, the first thing to do is to determine what number of Representatives will best promote wise and beneficent legislation and then apportion the number thus ascertained among the States according to their respective numbers.

Observing, then, the order indicated I shall speak first to the question what ought to be the total number of Representatives; or if the action of the Census Committee in any degree reflects the prevailing sentiment of this House the question for purposes of discussion may be put in more convenient form: ought the number of Representatives be increased beyond 307, which is the lowest number suggested by any member of the committee? I have no special preference for that number, but regard it as being in the neighborhood of what the membership of the House ought to be. To the question thus qualified a negative, it seems to me, is the proper answer. And were it not for the inconvenience and embarrassment which usually flow from the reversal of established conditions, I, for one, should favor a reduction rather than an increase.

It is said by some that the number ought to be enlarged because it will more adequately guard against the operation of improper influences upon legislation. Numbers, up to a certain point, are protective in this respect; but carried beyond that point which admits of methodical procedure they would obstruct if not altogether defeat the ends they are claimed to subserve. It is but the recitation of a lesson taught by thousands of years of experience to say that in assemblies too numerously constituted method is lost in confusion, thoughtful discussion drowned by turbulent discussion, and all things ordered by disorder. In such an assembly the fewer will be the men who in fact direct its proceedings. Speaking to the House on this point in 1871, Mr. Kerr said:

It is sometimes claimed that, as you enlarge a legislative body you improve its conduct and enable it better to represent the people. That is done only to the extent of requiring a medium or moderate number, such a number as will enable the whole body to gather needful information concerning the wants and conditions of the different sections and people of the country. I think it is vain to assume that if the House were more numerous than it is it would any better understand the demands of the country than it does, or any more efficiently its duties or give any more faithful attention to current business of the House.

Said Mr. Madison in fifty-eighth number of the Federalist:

The people can never err more than in supposing that by multiplying their representatives beyond a certain limit they strengthen the barrier against the government of a few. Experience will forever admonish them that, on the contrary, after securing a sufficient number for the purposes of safety, of local information, and of diffusive sympathy with the whole society, they will counteract their own views by every addition to their representatives. The countenance of the Government may become more democratic, but the soul that animates it will be more oligarchic. The machine will be enlarged, but the fewer, and often the more secret, will be the springs by which its motions are directed.

No, Mr. Speaker, numbers alone have not in the past, nor will they ever in the future, secure the enactment of wise and wholesome laws. Numbers up to a certain point, as already conceded, are protective, but the surest bulwarks behind which a free people can intrench themselves against the assaults of those who purpose wicked and corrupt legislation are the keen consciousness of individual responsibility which frequent elections impress upon the Representative, and, little weight as some may attach to it, that laudable ambition and that native honesty which God Almighty plants in the breasts of men at their birth, without stopping to inquire whether in the drama of life they are to play the parts of agents or principals.

It is said again that our expanded territory and increased population demand a greater number of Representatives. This argument is plausible; but it cannot stand the torch of investigation. Its fallacy lies in an erroneous conception of the theory of representation. Representative government, it is true, closer approximates pure democratic popular rule the more nearly the number of Representatives corresponds to the people. But this nearness in point of numbers, so far from being an element of representation, may be carried to an extent utterly subversive of it.

The very conditions which in republics call into practice the theory of representation are the physical impossibility of the people assembling in masses for the enactment of laws, and the inevitable confusion which would overwhelm their deliberations even if it were possible for them thus to assemble. Representation is but a device, and a wise one, to avoid these unfavorable conditions and yet secure government of the people. The main condition it seeks to get away from is the drawing together of large unwieldy numbers in a single body.

It accomplishes its ends by parceling out among different bodies the functions of government originally lodged in one, and by reducing the number of persons in each body who are to exercise the functions set apart to it. Therefore the fundamental ideas of representation are division of powers and reduction of agents. Neither of these ideas demand nearness in point of numbers between Representatives and those represented. On the contrary, they favor remoteness in this respect, so far as is consistent with the purposes of local information and diffusive sympathy with the wants, wishes, and interests of all classes of people.

The representative principle has its highest development where the number of Representatives is just large enough, and no larger, to make the district small enough for each Representative to intelligently know, earnestly sympathize with, and diligently pursue the interests and wishes of those from whom his trust is immediately derived. These requirements are thus summed up by Kent:

A due acquaintance with every part of the Union ought to be carried into the House, and a sufficient number collected for all the purposes of information, discussion, and diffusive sympathy with the wants and wishes of the people. When these objects are obtained, any further increase neither promotes deliberation nor increases the public safety.

In the early days of the Republic, for reasons too obvious to need mention, these opportunities for and requisites to faithful representation were to be looked for in districts of limited territory and population. Now the easy, convenient, and rapid facilities everywhere accessible for travel and association have brought such enlarged opportunities that limitations of territory and population are not so important as they were then.

It is true that the inhabitants of this country have swollen from 3,500,000 in the first decade of our national life to more than 50,000,000 in this, the eleventh. It is also true that these inhabitants are not now confined to one strip of territory, walled on its western side by mountain ranges, but are scattered from one ocean to the other, across a continent the vastness of whose proportions defy accurate measurement. But to meet the political, social, and commercial needs of this matchless growth, corresponding developments have been made in our material resources, and agencies then unthought of have been appropriated to their utilization. Elements have been subdued. A mighty tractive force, a hundred years ago hid away in the unexplored arcana of matter, has been brought to light and successfully applied to purposes of travel and transportation. That subtle power of nature, electricity, then comparatively unknown save in its atmospheric manifestations, has been made a ductile agent for the instantaneous transmission of thought. Through these two instrumentalities distance and duration, as hinderances to political and other engagements, have been so nearly annihilated that space is but a point and time but an instant.

I submit that under these products of modern civilization all the opportunities for and requisites of faithful representation exist in as full force and power as they did in 1789, when the House of Representatives was composed of but 65 members. Again the argument that there should be an enlarged membership in the House responsive to increased population throughout the country, if followed to its logical conclusion, leads to consequences manifestly absurd. If the Republic were in its decline, if the anniversaries which more than a hundred times have commemorated its birth were nearing their destined limits, the membership of the House for the next ten years would be a matter of little moment, so far as precedent is concerned. But this Government is not for a century only; if the realizations of the future shall be at all answerable to the hopes and aspirations of the present, it will live on through generations yet unborn, long after empires in older quarters of the globe have been dismembered and their establishments of force supplanted by free institutions. Each recurring decade will bring, if not accessions of territory, continued increases of population, until every available foot of land on the plain of the Atlantic will grow fruitful under the plowman's touch, and the homes of teeming millions take up all the western acreage that now lies unbroken between the great lakes of the north and our southern seas.

There is no limit to this sure multiplication of numbers save the exhaustion of the capabilities of our soil for sustaining additional inhabitants; and these capabilities are practically inexhaustible. Why, sir, it is estimated by those familiar with her resources that the State of Texas alone, upon whose fertile prairies the world is pouring restless streams of immigration, with her 274,356 square miles of territory, is capable of sustaining a population equal to that of France. Follow up the principle of decennial increases in the membership of the House, and we will ultimately reach a point where the House will be as large and unwieldy as were assemblies of the people in the ancient republics. Three hundred and seven, or something near that number, will make the House large enough for all the ends of true representation, and certainly as large as is consistent with the proper dispatch of business. Then, why further enlarge it? Will it be less expensive? Will it remove any of the burdens of taxation that now rest so heavily on the masses of the people? Will it promote order? Will it secure greater deliberation to our councils? Will higher wisdom mark our actions? Theory can suggest no sufficient reason for greater enlargement; experience bristles with protests against it.

I come now to the second process in the apportionment, which is the ascertainment of the ratio of Representatives to population. This is done by dividing the whole representative population of the United States by the total number of Representatives. Being a mere act of division it is needless to say more in reference to it.

This brings me to the third process of the apportionment, which is the distribution among the States of the total number of Representatives as fixed on the ratio ascertained. This is accomplished by applying the ratio of the total number of Representatives to the whole representative population of the United States as a common divisor to the populations of all the States; the quotients thus obtained being the number of Representatives to which each State is entitled on an even division. Up to this point the process is simple and unembarrassed by dispute. The controversy begins with the next step.

There is no common ratio which will evenly divide the population of all the States. In each case fractions will be left over; besides, the number of Representatives secured on even division is always short of the number proposed. The difficulty lies in disposing of the fractions so as to make up this shortage.

This question of fractions has always been a fruitful source of conflicting opinions. Out of it in part grew Washington's veto of the first apportionment bill of 1792. The practice inaugurated by this veto of disregarding fractions prevailed through five apportionments, although the correctness of the veto in this particular has always been questioned by some of our ablest writers on constitutional law. The principle of fractional representation had its first application in 1842, has been since acted on, and is now too firmly established to admit of serious question. In 1842 the fractions were disposed of on the moiety system, that is, by giving an additional Representative to each State having a fraction greater than one-half of the common ratio. The defect of this system is that it will not always give the exact number of Representatives proposed. And this defect led to the method first adopted in the general census law of 1850. This method, after getting the number of Representatives each State is entitled to on even division, allots an additional Representative to the State having the largest fraction, an additional Representative to the State having the next largest fraction, and so on until the total number of Representatives is made up. This is what we now call the "old" method. For this method the majority of the Census Committee have in their bill substituted a "new" method, recommended in a communication addressed by Mr. C. W. Seaton to General F. A. Walker, bearing date October 25, 1881.

The design of this new method Mr. Seaton states as follows:

The old method compares the remainders left after the divisions above described, and assigns an additional Representative, first, to that State where the remainder after division was greatest; next, to the State where the remainder was next in size; and so on in order of rank of the remainders until the difference is made up. It is my opinion that it is not these remainders but rather the quotients which result from dividing the populations of the States by the increased number of Representatives, which should govern the allotment, and that the additional Representatives should be so assigned that the population of the districts formed in the State to which additional Representatives are allotted shall fall as little below the average number for the United States as possible; in other words, that the districts ultimately formed from the States so increased shall approximate as closely as possible in population to that of a district which should be formed by dividing the total population of the United States exactly by the proposed total number of Representatives. If it were true that districts each containing a population exactly equal to the ratio of Representatives to population for the United States must first be carved out of each State, and that enough districts to fill the quota were afterward to be made from the fragments left, then the old method of allotment would no doubt be the proper one. In that case the largest remaining fragments would necessarily receive the additional Representatives. But the practice and, so far as I know, the law has uniformly aimed to divide the States finally, after the number of Representatives for each State has been determined, in such manner that in each State the districts shall be as nearly equal to each other in population as possible.

I shall not consume time with the details of the new method. They are elaborate and complicated, and no general statement can make them intelligible. I charge, however, that it is open to two serious objections, either of which ought to be fatal to its adoption:

First. In actual results, as well as expressed design, it violates the constitutional rule of apportionment.

Representatives * * * shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers.

Such is the plain language of the Constitution.

Now what does the rule mean? Let it be remembered that this clause of the Constitution must be so construed as to give it efficacy, must be so construed as to make it susceptible of execution. Owing to the fact—and I am now following a line of thought suggested in the report of Mr. Webster in 1832, from which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] read last week—owing to the fact that representation unlike taxes is incapable of indefinite subdivision—owing to the fact that there can be nothing less than one Representative, exact apportionment according to numbers is unattainable; inequalities will exist somewhere. These unavoidable consequences were as fully known to the framers of the Constitution as they are now known to us. The constitutional rule, therefore, does not require mathematical exactness. The true interpretation of it is that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers" as nearly as numerical computations will allow; and an apportionment according to numbers as nearly as is attainable is a full compliance with the rule, not merely an approach to it, because approximation itself is the rule.

Now, if any total number of Representatives could be found whose ratio to the whole representative population of the United States applied as a common divisor to the populations of all the States would produce entire quotients on each division, the apportionment of such a number in such a manner would be exactly according to numbers. The test, therefore, of mathematical exactness is the entire absence of fractions after all the processes have been completed. But no possible apportionment can square to this test. In every case fractions will be left over. Now, what is the nearest approach to the standard of mathematical exactness? Suppose three methods to be used with varying results. One method leaves as the aggregate of unrepresented fractions 10, another 5,000, and another 100,000. Which of these methods comes nearest to the test? Obviously the one whose aggregate of unrepresented fractions is 10. Why? Because the test of mathematical exactness is the entire absence of fractions; and 10 is a nearer approach to this state of things than either 100,000 or 5,000.

So that by synthesis we can formulate the other rule needed to complete the apportionment; and it is this: that the nearest approach to mathematical exactness is where the aggregate of unrepresented fractions is smallest. This smallest aggregate of unrepresented fractions, as is obvious to the commonest understanding, can be obtained only by allotting additional Representatives to the States whose fractions are largest. It is just here that the new method departs from the constitutional rule by allotting, on account of fractions, additional Representatives to some States and withholding them from other States, when the States to which the allotments are made have fractions smaller than the States from which the allotments are withheld.

I have here four tables showing this result. One is prepared with reference to the total number of Representatives assumed by Mr. Seaton, 293; another with reference to the total number reported by the majority of the committee, 320; another with reference to the number proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COLERICK,] 316, and another with reference to the number recommended by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] 307.

NUMBER OF REPRESENTATIVES, 293.
(Ratio, 168,503.)

States.	Number of Representatives under new method.		Number of Representatives under old method.		Fractions resulting after dividing population of State by ratio of Representatives to population.
	On even division.	After fractional allotments.	On even division.	After fractional allotments.
States whose representation is larger under new method:
Pennsylvania	25	26	25	25	70,316
New York	30	31	30	30	27,781
Massachusetts	10	11	10	10	98,055
Illinois	18	19	18	18	44,817
Ohio	18	20	18	19	165,008
States whose representation is larger under old method:
Minnesota	4	4	4	5	106,761
Connecticut	3	4	3	4	117,191
West Virginia	3	3	3	4	112,948
Nebraska	2	2	2	3	115,386
Rhode Island	1	1	1	2	108,023

NUMBER OF REPRESENTATIVES, 320.
(Ratio, 154,285.)

States whose representation is larger under new method:
Illinois	19	21	19	20	146,456
New York	32	34	32	33	145,751
Pennsylvania	27	29	27	28	117,196
States whose representation is larger under old method:
California	5	5	5	6	93,269
Florida	1	1	1	2	115,208
Rhode Island	1	1	1	2	122,246

NUMBER OF REPRESENTATIVES, 316.
(Ratio, 156,238.)

States whose representation is larger under new method:
New York	33	34	32	33	83,255
Ohio	20	21	20	20	73,302
Pennsylvania	27	28	27	27	64,465
States whose representation is larger under old method:
California	5	5	5	6	83,504
Florida	1	1	1	2	113,255
Rhode Island	1	1	1	2	120,293

NUMBER OF REPRESENTATIVES, 307.
(Ratio, 160,819.)

States whose representation is larger under new method:
Georgia	9	10	9	9	94,890
Missouri	13	14	13	13	77,333
New York	31	33	31	32	97,482
States whose representation is larger under old method:
Florida	1	1	1	2	108,674
Nebraska	2	2	2	3	130,764
Rhode Island	1	1	1	2	115,712

Now referring to these tables, take the number of Representatives reported by the committee—320. The total number of Representatives on an even division is 302; the number to be made up is 18. Both methods give the same result as to 15 members; they vary as to the three remaining members, and therefore affect six States. Each of those large States—Illinois, New York, and Pennsylvania—gains 2 additional Representatives for each fraction, while California, Florida, and Rhode Island are denied 1 Representative each, although having large fractions. By the new method the aggregate of unrepresented fractions is 240,969 larger than by the old method. Kindred results are shown in all these tables. There is no total number of Representatives which can be selected in which this same result will not be manifested; that is, that additional Representatives are allotted to large States for small fractions, while additional Representatives are withheld from small States that have larger fractions.

Now, the old method is the correct method for the reason that by allotting additional Representatives to the States whose fractions are largest, there will remain the smallest aggregate of unrepresented fractions, and, as I have already shown, this is the nearest possible approach to mathematical exactness. But again, this old method is based upon the plain, simple rule of three. As was stated pertinently by my colleague [Mr. MILLS] a few days ago, if there be truth in mathematical rules, then the old method is correct. The proportion which it formulates is simply this: the whole representative population of the United States is to the total number of Representatives as the population of each State is to its share in the representative power.

It will be observed in applying this proportion to the populations of the several States that the first and second terms are fixed; the process therefore can be abridged by dividing the first by the second, and then applying it as a divisor to the third. To illustrate this old method, take the number proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] 307. The proportion then reads 49,371,340, which is the whole population of the United States, is to 307 as 5,082,871, the population of New York, is to New York's share in the representative power of the Government. That proportion works out as the exact mathematical share for New York 31.53 Representatives. Now the old method gives to New York 32; the new method gives her 33. Why ought she not to have 32? Why should she have 33? She ought to have 32, because 18 additional Representatives are to be made up, and her fraction is sixteenth in point of size, and besides 32 in this case, as is usually true under the old method, is the nearest whole number to which New York is entitled. Now is not the Constitution fully satisfied when she gets her 32 members? Is not the Constitution violated when you go further and give her a thirty-third member? For what is the thirty-third member given her? Not for numbers; numbers do not entitle her to quite 32. Not in order to apportion according to numbers as nearly as is attainable, for 32 is the nearest attainable number to mathematical exactness. Why, then, in the name of common sense and common justice, give her this thirty-third member?

There is no reason for it except that Mr. Seaton, the author of this method, (and I doubt not that in the light which discussion here has thrown upon the matter he would be willing to repudiate his production if he could well do so,) wants to enable all the States in the Union to which increased representation is allotted to conform the population of their districts to an imaginary modulus. He says:

> But the practice, and, so far as I know, the law is uniformly aimed to divide States finally, after the number of Representatives for each State has been determined, in such manner that in each State the districts shall be as nearly to each other in population as possible.

I read from Mr. Seaton's report. The ready answer to that statement is that the Constitution contemplates no such thing. The statement itself is as much at variance with the history of prior apportionments as the method it seeks to vindicate is to the constitutional rule of apportionment. There has been no such uniform practice. There has been but one law looking to that end, and that was embraced in the act of 1872. On this point I desire to read an extract from the report of Mr. Webster, made in 1832, to which I have already referred:

> That Constitution contemplates no integer or any common number for the constituents of a member of the House of Representatives. It goes not at all into these subdivisions of the population of a State. It provides for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers, and stops there. It makes no provision for the representation of districts, of States, or for the representation of any portion of the people of a State less than the whole. It says nothing of ratios or of constituent numbers. All these things it leaves to State legislation. The right which each State possesses to its own due portion of the representative power is a State right strictly; it belongs to the State as a State, and it is to be used and exercised as the State may see fit, subject only to the constitutional qualifications of electors.

The second objection to this new method is that its inevitable effect is unjustly to aggrandize the political power of the larger States at the expense of the smaller States. The tables to which I have already referred show this result beyond all dispute. Here we find that Illinois, taking the report of the majority of the committee, for a fraction of 146,000 is given two additional Representatives, while California, with a fraction of 93,269, is denied one. New York also gets two additional Representatives for a fraction of 145,000, while Rhode Island, with a fraction of 122,246, is denied one. Pennsylvania gets two additional Representatives for a fraction of 117,196, while Florida is denied one with a fraction of 115,208.

But take the number suggested by the gentleman from New York, 307, and I desire to compare the States of New York and Rhode Island. New York, with a fraction of 97,482, gets two additional Representatives, while Rhode Island, with a larger fraction of 115,712, is denied one. That is to say, that New York gets two additional Representatives when in population she lacks 63,337 of having enough for one. Or, to state it in other words, she gets the thirty-third Representative, when in numbers she lacks 63,337 of having a single constituent for him to represent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how can any method which works such shocking results be vindicated? Is it a reward to New York because she has the largest representation of any State in the Union, and a punishment upon Rhode Island for having the smallest? Whence cometh this retributive justice? Not from the Constitution. Its rule works a more righteous result. Then where the authority? I know not, sir, unless it be that other law: "Whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him" miserable wretch! "shall be taken even that he hath." [Laughter.]

This paradox—that seems to be a favorite word now—this paradox may serve a useful purpose in enforcing religious obligations or elucidating parabolical obscurities, but it will not do for the apportionment of political power among the States. Monstrous as is the wrong of giving representation to one State which belongs to another, it is aggravated in this instance because the beneficiary of the wrong is the largest State of the Union and the victim of the wrong is the smallest. "The right," said Webster, "which each State possesses to its own due share of representative power is a State right strictly." No ampler security for this right can be found anywhere than in the now pertinent language of Chief-Justice Chase, "that this Government is an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States." The rights of all the States to their respective share of representation are the same. The powers secured by these rights may be and are of different magnitudes, but the right of the smallest State is as sacred and inviolable as the right of the largest.

I remember, sir, to have read that when at the court of Periander of Corinth, more than 2,000 years ago, the question was propounded to the seven wise men of Greece: What popular government is most perfect? and all had answered, the memorable response of the great Athenian law-giver was decided to be of greatest weight, "That government," he answered, "is best in which an injury done to the humblest subject is an insult to the whole constitution."

In the apportionment of the political power of this indestructible Union of indestructible States let it be forever ordained that an injury done to the smallest State is an insult to all the States. Let this new method which insults all the States by injuring the smallest be repudiated now with such ringing emphasis that its application will never again be attempted. As the Forty-seventh Congress must suffer the reproach of being its birth-place, so let the Forty-seventh Congress enjoy the glory of being its sepulcher.

Mr. Speaker, there is one other matter to which I desire to allude, and while the evil suggested cannot be remedied by the bill now pending, I beg the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I refer to it, and it seems that this is a fitting occasion to mention it when we are engaged in constructing the membership of the House of Representatives for the next ten years. There is, sir, no question that ought more profoundly to concern us and engage our attention than the preservation in this House of the representative principle which underlies the whole structure of the Republic. I have shown that this principle is in no danger from the failure to increase the number of Representatives upon this floor. If there be danger menacing the principle at all, it is from an entirely different quarter, and lies in the utter lack of conformation of the machinery of the House to its structure. The principles of representation are not confined merely to the constitution of the representative body, but, under certain conditions, they may as profoundly concern its procedure. In my remarks upon this point, I do not intend in the remotest degree criticism or reflection upon the ability and integrity with which the distinguished men who at different times have been inducted to the high office of Speaker have discharged its duties. I refer not to them, nor to their action. I only speak of the system. Both in structure and numbers this House is representative; in machinery the representative principle is invaded. All the springs of action which start and direct its motions have their original source, potentially at least, in the breast of the presiding officer. This is the necessary consequence of his investiture with the power of appointing committees. As presenting a striking contrast to this state of things, I desire to read an epigrammatic account of one of the most memorable, and to lovers of liberty, one of the most interesting events chronicled in English annals. I read now from Hatsell's Precedents:

> The speaker, though he ought upon all occasions to be treated with the greatest respect and attention by the individual members of the house, is in fact, as was said on the 9th of March, 1620, but a servant of the house and not their master, and it is therefore his first duty to obey implicitly the orders of the house without attending to any other commands. This duty is extremely well expressed in a very few words by Mr. Speaker Lenthal, who, when that ill-advised monarch, Charles the First, came into the House of Commons, and, having taken the speaker's chair, asked him whether any of the five members that he came to apprehend were in the House? whether he saw any of them? and where they were? made this answer: "May it please Your Majesty, I have neither eyes to see nor tongue to speak in this place but as the house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here; and humbly beg Your Majesty's pardon that I cannot give any other answer than this to what Your Majesty is pleased to demand of me."

But am I asked the question, Is not the machinery of this House of Representatives in this respect the same to-day that it was in 1792? I answer, yes. Was the machinery of the House then autocratic? No. Both of these answers are correct, yet the apparent inconsistency they seem to involve is not real. For the question whether power be autocratic or otherwise depends upon the method of its exercise and the conditions to which this method is applied. In 1789 the House of Representatives was composed of but 65 members. Then it was strictly a deliberative body. Then the labors and reports of the committees were but preliminary and suggestive, consequently the method of constituting the committees was a matter of small moment. How is it now? We have 293 members. The House has ceased to be a deliberative body. The labors and reports of committees, though but preliminary and suggestive still in theory, in effect are final and decisive. Measures make their first appearance in the House only because it is the prescribed channel to committee-rooms, where they are either buried or discussed, formulated, and perfected.

The power, therefore, to constitute the committees of the House now, and let the country know it, the power to constitute committees now is practically the power of legislation.

This power, Mr. Speaker, is constitutionally lodged in the full membership of this body. It cannot be abdicated in favor of one of our own members without disregarding the fundamental law of our trust, which restrains the redelegation of delegated power.

It is no answer to the violation of this principle to say it is more orderly to raise our committees in this way than by the nomination of the House, and avoids confusion, combinations, log rolling, if you please, which would attend the latter plan. Orderly proceeding, sir, is a thing greatly to be desired and diligently sought after, but valuable principles ought not to be bartered away for it. There may be more of order in constituting committees by appointment of the presiding officer than by nomination of the House; but is it such order as accords with the theory of our institutions? Why, sir, the principles of subordination and obedience which look to one will as the source of authority, and upon which vast military establishments are based, form the most orderly arrangements ever devised for the direction of human energy to a given end. But it is the order of absolutism, not of freedom. It is the order upon which despotism the world over rests. It is the order which fixed and securely holds in the mailed hand of the Czar of Russia those supreme prerogatives of pure and unmixed imperialism which oppress and curse millions of our race. It is the order which enables the iron chancellor of United Germany to command the mightiest armies of earth to the enforcement of the arbitrary rescripts of his imperial master. It is an order utterly out of order with and alien to free, representative government. It is an order which, however lessened in degree and softened in harshness of exercise, ought not to be practiced in this House under existing conditions; and I, for one, trust that the outraged principles of representation will reassert themselves in the next Congress with such power and effect as to so change the rules of the House that the absolute autocracy they now fix for its domination will be utterly abrogated and destroyed. [Applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. Immediately after the report had been made to this House by the Committee on the Census of the bill now under consideration, and after I had examined the same with care and industry, I formed the purpose to address the House in opposition to the plan proposed, and that, too, in the face of the fact that my own State, which I in part represent, was to be the gainer of an additional Representative on this floor; because I did not believe that my people or any other part of the population of Pennsylvania desired a representation on this floor which was not their due.

While the plan of Mr. Seaton may be mathematically correct, its execution works gross injustice. But this debate, at all events this particular point of the debate, has been exhausted, and it is not therefore necessary that I should do what I intended, except that I desire to formulate, and as I will have read by the Clerk what I propose that the House, if the opportunity shall offer, may vote upon as the opinion of the House in this particular. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has given notice that he will move at the proper time to recommit this bill. If he should continue of that mind I shall then take the opportunity of accompanying that committal with the form of instructions which I send to the desk. This subject having been brought to the attention of the House and the country, it seems to me it is proper that this House shall express its opinion upon the two plans in controversy. The Clerk will be kind enough to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. Resolved, That the method for apportioning Representatives recommended in a communication addressed by Mr. C. W. Seaton to General F. A. Walker, bearing date October 5, 1881, and used in framing House bill No. 3550, reported by the majority of the Census Committee, does not apportion Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers, as the Constitution enjoins, and is, therefore, not in accord with the sense of this House.

2. That the method known as the "old" method, which applies the ratio of the total number of Representatives and the aggregate Representative population of all the States as a common divisor to the population of the several States, making the entire quotients thus obtained the numbers of Representatives to which the respective States are entitled on even division, and then allots an additional Representative to the State having the largest fraction, an additional Representative to the State having the next largest fraction, and so on, until the total number of Representatives is made up, does apportion Representatives among the States according to their respective numbers as nearly as is attainable, and shall therefore be adopted in distributing the total number of Representatives which may be determined on.

Mr. RANDALL. At the proper time, if the rule will permit, I will submit that resolution, if the gentleman from New York should not make his motion, as a new proposition in separate form to be voted on. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE.]

Mr. CONVERSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House for a few minutes to the amendment offered by me several days since to the apportionment bill. I invite criticism and a careful comparison between it and the other two propositions or methods offered. No system or plan of apportionment ought in my judgment to be adopted unless it will stand searching scrutiny, criticism, and comparison.

If there is any one quality or characteristic which is more distinctively and peculiarly American than another, it is that of fairness, impartiality, and love of justice. This is not only true in public affairs, but extends to the private and personal relations in life.

The bill before the House presented by the Census Committee, which embraces the first plan, is already killed though no vote has yet been taken, and there is no need of spending time or breath in again exposing its glaring inequalities, and injustice, and favoritism for the larger States at the expense of the smaller ones. The gentleman who made the first speech against the bill, [Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts,] by his array of facts and figures, has made it so odious that even the committee would be glad to see it buried out of sight. The ingenious figurer at the Census Office is chiefly responsible for its existence.

By that plan the number of Representatives in the House during the next decade is first established. The whole population of the United States, as ascertained by the census of 1880, is then divided by the number of Representatives so agreed upon, and the quotient is taken as the ratio of representation. Then each State is given as many Representatives as it has whole ratios of population. That would leave a fraction of a ratio in each State unrepresented, and consequently the number of members less than that originally agreed upon. Then all of the fractions of all of the States are added together, and representation for them, except in so far as they have been taken up by giving Delaware and Nevada a Representative each with a population less than a ratio, under the Constitution, is proposed to be given to those States whose ratios would be least diminished by the additional Representatives thus given to it. The unjust effects of that plan have been already demonstrated by several gentlemen in this debate.

The second plan proposed embraces the old method, and has been most earnestly advocated by several of the eloquent gentlemen who have taken part in this debate. By this plan exactly the same course is pursued as in the first till you come to the point of giving representation for the fractions of a ratio in the several States. It proposes to give an additional representative for the next decade, first, to the State having the largest fraction; second, to the State having the next largest fraction, and so on till the number of Representatives agreed upon for the House is reached, and during the same period to deny representation for the remaining fractions to those States so unfortunate as to be in that predicament. This system is uncertain in its results; by it the quota of members may be filled by States having large fractions, and some having more than half a ratio may entirely lose the power to which its numbers entitle it. No one will claim that this plan will work equal and exact justice between the States, though far superior to the plan of the committee. It certainly would be no honor to any State or to Representatives to ask or receive a larger representation than that to which the State is entitled by reason of its population, under the Constitution. That instrument requires a new enumeration every ten years, and a new apportionment of representation between the States for the ten succeeding years according to population.

This method is in principle the plan adopted in the counting-house. In the calculation of interest, if the fraction is above half a cent it is counted as one cent; if less than half it is thrown away. The merchant adopts it in figuring the price of his articles. If the fraction is above half a cent when results are ascertained it is counted as one; if less it is thrown away. There is a rough justice about it that in these small matters makes it practical justice. But in large transactions, such as calculating taxes, the fractions less than a half cent are not thrown away. The mills are counted even to the hundredth part of a mill. Shall we not as carefully calculate representation as taxes? Shall we not as carefully estimate and apportion political power among the States as we would taxes among the people? Can we afford as between the sovereign States of this Union in partitioning the political power between them to give and take by halves in that way? The States cannot afford to lose for ten years, through five distinct Congresses, that measure of political power represented by such a fraction. It is too great a sacrifice; it is unjust. The States having a fraction above half a ratio cannot afford to ask more than the Constitution entitles them to, namely, representation during the decade according to population.

There being, then, this inequality and injustice in the division of political power by this method between the States under the Constitution; it being unjust to deprive a State for ten years of all political power on account of the fraction less than half a ratio, and equally unjust to give a State with a fraction above half political power for ten years to which its population is not entitled under the Constitution, why not introduce the element of time as a means of more nearly approximating a just and equal division of political power between the States? It is a monstrous proposition to take political power from a State that is justly entitled to it and give it to a State that is not entitled to it.

This apportionment is for ten years, and for the five consecutive Congresses succeeding the present one. If a State, then, after she has been given a representation for each full ratio, has a fraction left equal to one-fifth of a ratio, why not give her an additional member in one of the five Congresses of the decennial period? If the fraction is equal to two-fifths of a ratio, why not give her an additional Representative in two of the five Congresses, if three-fifths in three Congresses, and if four-fifths in four of the five Congresses of the decennial period?

This is my plan and the substance of my amendment. It is not perfect. Under it a fraction of less than one-fifth of a ratio may be thrown away; but it is not given to some other State, thus doubling the injustice; but is, in my judgment, a nearer approximation to an equal division of political power between the States in the House of Representatives, under the Constitution, than either of the other methods will afford.

It may be urged, Mr. Speaker, that this method is new and untried, and therefore unsafe in a matter of such magnitude and importance. My answer is that the principle is not new. It has been applied in several of the States to equalize representation, and is only new and untried in so far as it has never been applied to representation in Congress among the States. For a great many years several of the New England States, with that quick appreciation of justice and equality characteristic of her people, have given those towns having less than the ratio a representation in their State Legislature according to the size of the fraction. If the fraction is equal to one-half the ratio then a member is given every other year; if one-third then every third year, &c. My own State (Ohio) has practiced this system of representation in both the senate and house of representatives for nearly thirty years. Every ten years the political power in the senate is divided between the senatorial districts, and the political power in the house of representatives between the counties for the ensuing ten years by this method, and it has everywhere worked well. The plan is provided in our State constitution, and no one could be found in our State to advocate a change in that respect.

By this method it is immaterial whether the ratio of representation be fixed upon the basis of 319 or of 293 members, or any other number of members. It works out, with any number of members, the same justice and the same equality of representation between the States. When the basis of representation is thus fixed, any gentleman can divide the population of his State by the ratio, and in one minute determine the representation his State is entitled to in each of the five Congresses of the next decade. The process is simple and easily understood, and results easily verified.

The additional Representative in any of the five Congresses can be elected in the State at large. This would have some advantages, because the member at large would always be of the same political faith as the dominant party in the State. Or the State Legislature, if it preferred, could reapportion the State.

I desire to call attention to another fact. I have found some errors in the tables that have been published on this subject, and whatever plan is adopted, the committee should, on behalf of the House, go over each table and test its accuracy as to each State. Gentlemen will find a table showing the representation each State is entitled to under my amendment for the next ten years, on page 973 of the RECORD, on a basis of 319 members.

The ratio in that case is 154,764, and the House would have in the Forty-eighth Congress 303 members; in the Forty-ninth, 309 members; in the Fiftieth, 316 members; in the Fifty-first, 324 members, and in the Fifty-second, the last of the decennial period, 329 members. There is one error in that table, occasioned by copying from a table published last year. The fraction in Connecticut is 98,391, instead of 93,627, as published in the table; consequently that State would be entitled to 3 Representatives, and 1 additional in the Fiftieth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONVERSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Where does the gentleman find any constitutional warrant for changing the representation oftener than once in a decade? It provides the time, and says you shall fix it for ten years.

Mr. CONVERSE. It provides no such thing; but it says the apportionment shall be made according to numbers. That is all it says, and it leaves this subject just there, as one on which we are to exercise our ingenuity and our own judgment. That instrument does not say that each Congress for the ten years shall have the same number of members, nor that each State shall have the same number of members for ten years. The representation is not changed oftener than once in a decade. By my amendment the representation of each State in each of the Congresses for the ten years is fixed and established.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. You make the numbers in the different Congresses vary.

Mr. CONVERSE. Certainly I do. And is there anything in the Constitution that forbids that? The Constitution does not provide the mode by which the apportionment of political power shall be made, only it shall be according to numbers.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question, for I want to understand this matter?

Mr. CONVERSE. Certainly.

Mr. HORR. Is it not true that under your method you will not get up to 320 members until the last Congress of the ten years?

Mr. CONVERSE. I will answer the gentleman. If you were to establish 319 as the basis of calculation, after ascertaining the ratio you would have by this method in the first Congress 303 Representatives, in the second Congress 309 Representatives, in the third Congress 316, in the fourth Congress 324, and in the fifth 329. I desire to suggest that these additional Representatives may be elected by the States at large if the States so desire.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I would like to ask the gentleman a question if he will permit me.

Mr. CONVERSE. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Suppose the ratio for each member is 175,000, and you make your apportionment now according to your statement; and then within the next five years 350,000 people move out of your State into my State. Then how will you arrange your representation?

Mr. CONVERSE. I will ask my friend from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] how he proposes to do it?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I would fix it as the Constitution fixes it, for ten years by the census, and then let it alone.

Mr. CONVERSE. That is exactly what I propose. I fix it by the census of 1880, and, being fixed, I let it alone. I commend to the gentleman his answer to his own question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALDRICH.) The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONVERSE. I hope my time may be extended a minute or two, so that I may answer these questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRIGGS. I would like to ask a question.

Mr. CONVERSE. Very well.

Mr. BRIGGS. If I understand the gentleman he would fix a changing number for the size of the House. It is perfectly easy in the amendment as proposed to determine the years when these various States having fractions shall send the other member, and so fix the size of the House substantially the same during the entire decade.

Mr. CONVERSE. That is all to be fixed now by this House. Each State will know, if this proposition shall be enacted into law, just how many members it will have for the next Congress, how many for the next following, and so on. The method is simple, and any gentleman in two minutes can calculate for himself the number of Representatives that his State would be entitled to in each Congress during the ten years.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. It is all fixed now?

Mr. CONVERSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. I would ask the gentleman how his plan would affect the electoral vote, which is fixed by the number of Representatives in each State?

Mr. CONVERSE. I suppose the electoral vote would be according to the number of Representatives of the year in which the electoral vote was needed.

Mr. BRUMM. Then Congress could now shape matters for the next Presidential election.

Mr. CONVERSE. Certainly, according to representation, and in that respect my plan does not differ from either of the others.

Mr. HORR. Would it be according to the number of Representatives elected at the election when the President is elected, or according to the number of Representatives then in Congress?

Mr. CONVERSE. Of course it would be the representation to which the State is entitled for the year in which the Presidential election occurs. That would be the Representatives then in Congress who had been elected at the preceding Congressional election.

Mr. FULKERSON obtained the floor and yielded to Mr. BELTZHOOVER.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak briefly and plainly in support of the amendment which I have proposed to the third section of the apportionment bill. This amendment, which was printed in the RECORD a few days ago and which I have slightly modified to meet some suggestions on the subject, I will now send to the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be unlawful to divide any county or parish in the formation of any district which shall consist of more than one county or parish, unless contiguous territory containing the ratio of inhabitants fixed by law for a district cannot be obtained without such division, and in all districts consisting of more than one county or parish the counties or parishes which are the most closely contiguous to each other and which have the number of inhabitants nearest to the ratio fixed by law shall be a representative district.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. This amendment is intended to prevent what is known as gerrymandering in the formation of Congressional districts by the Legislatures of the several States. If this end can be achieved in the way I propose, or by any other method which may be suggested by the discussion of the subject, it will be more important and efficient in securing just representation to the people than any other provision contained in the bill. We have listened for several days to speeches from gentlemen contending with great ability and zeal and some rancor about the loss of a single Representative in several States in the interest of several other States; but they have overlooked or forgotten the fact that by the system of fraudulent arrangement of the Congressional districts in many of the States the people are robbed out of scores of Representatives. What difference will it make to the great commonwealth of Pennsylvania whether she gets twenty-eight or twenty-nine members if her Legislature can so distribute the number allowed as to practically disfranchise one-half of her citizens? This is the exact question which is presented by the condition of affairs which has existed in that and many other States for a decade. This is no new offense against the spirit of the law and the fundamental principles of representative government. It has come down to us from a former generation as a miserable remnant and relic of what was a greater crime against the rights of the people, and which required the long and arduous labors of the best men who have ever adorned the annals of our politics to overcome and eradicate. It is the outcropping of that spirit which maintained from the foundation of the Government in 1789 down to 1842 that it was unconstitutional and unlawful for Congress to interfere in any way with the action of the States in the election of Federal Representatives. It was held that they might elect them in any way they pleased, either by a general ticket or by districts of contiguous territory or of territory ever so widely separated, or partly by districts and partly by a general ticket. It was boldly declared by the political leaders of that time that the minorities in the States had no rights to representation in the Federal Government which the State Legislatures were in any way bound to respect. The rights of minorities were utterly disregarded and defied, and although the very existence and permanence of the Government was threatened there was no method of restraining the selfish and tyrannical conduct of the State Legislatures. This crude and unjust and unrepublican system continued down to 1842, when for the first time in our history a section was inserted in the apportionment bill requiring the States to elect their members of Congress by districts of contiguous territory and containing the ratio of inhabitants fixed by law for one Representative. Up to that time seven of the twenty-six States elected their members of Congress on general tickets; but the oppression of the minorities in the States and the facility with which a few unscrupulous leaders in a few States could control the national Legislature, and the consequent dangers to the Government which threatened from this system, eventually brought a reform almost by common consent. It was a great reform wrought by the greatest men of the nation, who unselfishly devoted the energies of years to the work, and its history should be studied by those who are intrusted at this day with the important duty of arranging the apportionment of members of Congress among the several States and providing for the manner of their election.

In 1823 this subject of requiring the States to elect by single districts of contiguous territory was first effectively brought to the attention of Congress in the consideration of the apportionment bill of that year:

> A committee was appointed by the House for the purpose of inquiring into the expediency of recommending to the several States the propriety of amending the Constitution of the United States in such manner that the mode of electing members of the House of Representatives in Congress may be uniform throughout the United States.

This was the first great step taken in the work of limiting the arbitrary power of the State Legislatures. The committee appointed under this resolution was headed by Mr. McDuffie, of South Carolina, who made an elaborate and exhaustive report, in which it was recommended—

> That each State should be divided into as many districts as will equal the number of Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress, and that each of said districts shall elect one Representative.

The report further says:

> It is susceptible of demonstration that the elections might be so arranged by a party in power that a small minority of the people should elect a majority of the national Representatives. The mode of operation would be various according to the varying circumstances. Sometimes the object would be accomplished by changing the district into the general ticket system, sometimes by an artificial arrangement of the districts, and sometimes by skillful arrangement of both. With a view to give strength and durability to the essential bonds of union it is of the utmost consequence that the local minorities in the several States and various geographical divisions of an extensive country should have a fair and full representation in Congress. In periods of deep political excitement nothing is better calculated to allay national animosities and subdue the angry spirit of faction than the mediatorial influence of such Representatives.

No language could more accurately describe the very same evil which, with its threatening consequences, exists in many of the States to-day. By the very same processes described by Mr. McDuffie three score years ago, "the local minorities by artificial arrangement of the districts" are utterly ignored in the plan of government, and under the dictation of partisan bosses the national Legislature is controlled by a majority elected by a minority of the people. In 1832 the same subject was again presented in Congress in the discussion of the apportionment bill of that year, and the very strongest men of that day exerted all their great powers to procure the district system. Able and eloquent reports were made on the subject, but so strong was the unholy greed for unlawful power by gerrymandering and fraud, that the system was again defeated. In 1842 the battle was once more renewed, and after half a century of conflict the right was at last triumphant. In that year, as I have before stated, an amendment was put on the apportionment bill requiring that members of Congress shall each "be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants." The same provision, with very little change in the language, has been contained in every apportionment bill passed since that time. The same provision is contained in the present bill in section 3, which I propose to amend by adding a still more explicit and imperative restriction on the Legislatures of the States.

In the consideration of this amendment there are two questions to be discussed: First. Have we the power to provide such a restriction in an apportionment bill? Second. Is such a restriction necessary to compel the State Legislatures to comply with the law? Under clause 1, section 4, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States it was settled in 1842 that Congress has the right and power to provide the manner in which the States shall elect their Representatives in the Federal Legislature. It was finally decided then and has never been controverted seriously since that because of the vicious and dangerous manner in which the State Legislatures exercised the power when permitted to them prior to 1842 the contingency had arisen in which it devolved on Congress to provide that the rights of all the people should be respected in Federal elections, and that minorities should not be disregarded. That power has never been in any way surrendered or modified, and there never was a more urgent necessity for its exercise than now.

What does the Constitution of the United States mean when it says in plain and imperative language that Representatives "Shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers." (See clause 3, section 2, article 1, and amendment 14 of Constitution.) It clearly means that Representatives shall be divided among the people evenly and fairly and justly. It means, in the language of Mr. McDuffie's report, that all the "various geographical divisions" and all the localities in this "extensive country should have a fair and full representation in Congress." How did Mr. McDuffie and the distinguished men who inaugurated the reform in 1842 provide that this system of apportioning Representatives should be maintained and enforced? By electing Congressmen by single districts composed of contiguous territory and each containing the ratio of inhabitants fixed by law. These provisions are plain and ought to have given all the people of all the States a fair apportionment of Representatives. But the result has grossly failed to justify the expectations of the great and patriotic men who laid down the law of 1842. Why? Because they confidingly addressed the requirements of that law to men of like honor and integrity with themselves. They did not dream in those halcyon days of the Republic of the specimens of statesmen which would infest the Legislatures of the States in later times. Mr. McDuffie and Mr. Webster and their cotemporaries would have lost faith in public virtue and the success of free institutions and stood paralyzed with disgust if you had shown them the dumb-bell district of Pennsylvania and told them that sworn legislators, senators and representatives of the proud old Commonwealth of Franklin and Muhlenberg had made such a district and under their solemn oaths called it contiguous territory.

The experience of the last decade has proven overwhelmingly that the provisions of section 3 in the pending bill requiring an honest apportionment of the States into even districts of contiguous territory are utterly inadequate and insufficient to reach the conscience of the modern legislator. Under this section of the bill as it now stands a large portion of the people in many of the States are disfranchised and unrepresented. Under it the very grossest of the evils complained of prior to 1842 are enacted again with a wickedness increased with the growth of the low cunning of the servile satrap of the modern boss. No respect whatever is paid to the contiguity of territory or the ratio of representation. Counties are torn into fragments and distributed by townships and half townships to meet the requirements of the vilest frauds. Counties widely separated are joined by narrow strips of land running like clothes-lines through intervening counties, and thus connected are called contiguous territory and erected into districts. In this spirit the Legislature of last winter in Pennsylvania made a judicial district consisting of two counties separated by many miles in order to carve out a district in which it is alleged one of the State senators thought he might be able to reach the ermine.

But let me illustrate the enormity of this offense against decent apportionment and fair representation by referring to some of the districts made under the last Congressional gerrymander in Pennsylvania.

Take the eleventh district, which is represented by my colleague, [Mr. KLOTZ.] In this district three Democratic counties are taken in one section, all contiguous and containing about four thousand Democratic majority. But not satisfied with swallowing up this large surplus of the minority party in the State, they want more, and while there is abundant contiguous territory they do not take it, but run a marvelously constructed belt or line across two large intervening counties, wresting therefrom in the passage twenty and one-half townships, containing 1,500 more Democratic majority, so as to strike and take in two other large Democratic counties with over 3,000 more Democratic majority. Thus we have a district, without a parallel in all the infamous history of fraudulent apportionment, in the shape of a dumb-bell, with two large ends and a handle between them, gathering up in its peculiar contiguous serpentine area about nine thousand Democratic majority. This district as it appears in the political text-books and almanacs, composed of five counties and parts of two counties, is bad enough, but as it appears on the map and to the people of the State it is the crowning work and masterpiece of that matchless band of political conspirators who have held the reins in Pennsylvania for years, and before whose sublime genius for political fraud and chicane their feeble imitators in all the other States grow green with envy. It is the ideal which delights the dreams of the machine-man as he contemplates it by day, and the fetich before which he bows at night in mute admiration for the marvelous work of his master's hand.

What is the result of this slicing off twenty and one-half townships from the two counties which were mutilated in making the remarkably contiguous territory of the eleventh district? Why, we have the twelfth district, consisting of parts of two counties which would otherwise be largely Democratic, but which, slicing off 1,500 Democratic majority, leaves the remainder so close as to permit my colleague, [Mr. SCRANTON,] a Republican, to slip in.

Take next the tenth district, where we have another interesting work of the great gerrymander's hand. There we have two large contiguous counties, with an abundantly sufficient number of inhabitants for a district, with 6,000 Democratic majority. But they are not satisfied with that, but go over into an adjoining county and wrest therefrom eleven townships, containing 2,000 more Democratic majority, and these townships they attach to the district, already large enough, so as to make it largely above the ratio and increase my colleague's [Mr. MUTCHLER] majority to over 8,000. Now, why was this done? So that the remainder of the county, which is otherwise Democratic, from which the eleven townships are taken may become Republican, and being attached to its adjoining county send my colleague [Mr. GODSHALK] to Congress from what would otherwise have been a fair Democratic district.

If there are any more infamous frauds on the people of any State in this whole nation, I have never heard of them. The Shoe-string district in Mississippi is bad enough, but it is only the work of an apprentice; it is child's play to the skillful carving of our Pennsylvania artists in fraud.

How do these things affect the representation of the great State in which they are perpetrated? In 1880 the Democratic party polled 407,428 votes, and elected 7 members of Congress. The Republicans polled 444,704 votes and elected 20 members. It took 50,928 votes to elect a Democratic Congressman, while it took only 23,450 votes to elect a Republican Congressman. Thus a large portion of the people of that great Commonwealth are disfranchised and unrepresented, and a great crime is committed against the fundamental principles of representative government and against the plain intention and purpose of the Constitution of the United States. The amendment which I propose will add an additional safeguard to that provided by the act of 1842, and if it does not prevent the professional political burglar from breaking through the law, it will at least convict him before the country of technical as well as moral perjury, and endanger the admission to Congress of the delegates from the State which plainly violates the law.

This is a principle in which the political progress and prosperity and permanence of this great Government are involved. The violation of it strikes at the foundation on which our whole political structure rests. Whether we endure or perish as a Republic depends upon whether we patriotically observe the laws of political existence upon which republics are founded, or whether we defy them. What we do now fixes our political system for a decade. We should therefore act deliberately and unselfishly and honestly. We should do all that ingenuity and zeal can do to build a bulwark high and strong around the conditions and limitations of political power.

Mr. FULKERSON yielded ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PETTIBONE.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to some features of the bill reported from the Select Committee on the Census, now under discussion, in reference to the apportionment, based on the census of 1880, of Representatives in Congress from the various States of this Union. It seems to me, with all deference to learned gentlemen, that we have had altogether too much hypothesis and too little of fact.

It further appears to me that it is plainly wise to follow the Constitution. It provides, in the fourteenth amendment, that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, excluding Indians not taxed." Now, since Indians not taxed are not to be taken into account, and since all our people are free, the sole demand of the Constitution, as applicable to the case before us, is that Representatives shall be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers, and so that each State shall have at least one Representative.

Now, this bill proposes to increase the next House to the number of 320. With this number I find no fault. Some number must be agreed upon. And it is evident that the sole question, taking 320 as a satisfactory basis, then is, does this bill apportion the 320 proposed Representatives among the States of this Union according to their respective numbers? If it does, or does it as near as is possible, owing to the fact that an exact division cannot be made, then if the proposed number is satisfactory and essentially just, this bill is unobjectionable and ought to pass. But the bill does not do this. I think it susceptible of easy demonstration that it does not.

It is apparent that no State can have a fraction of a Representative in this House—wise or unwise, he must count one at roll-call. And taking our whole population, excluding Indians not taxed, of 49,371,340, and dividing that number by 320, the proposed number of Representatives, we get as a quotient the number of people who should have here one Representative. This number it is agreed on all hands is 154,285.

Now, if we take the population of each of the States respectively and divide it by 154,285 we shall get in the case of each State save two, viz: Nevada and Delaware, a whole number as a quotient, with a remaining fraction over, in some larger in some smaller. But allotting as we must a Representative to both Nevada and Delaware, the aggregate population of both being only 208,874, we find then the true modulus, or divisor, or basis for each district is or must be 154,910. Yet we find that when we so divide the number of people of each State and for each time that 154,910 goes in the whole number of the people of each State we allot a number to that State there will be 302 full districts; and setting to each State the full number that 154,910 will go as a divisor in the number of its people we shall have for twenty-three of the States exactly the number which this bill allots to them. For the other fifteen States there will be a less number than this bill allots to them. Delaware and Nevada have each less than 154,910 inhabitants; but each shall have at least one "Representative" is the imperative language of the Constitution. This bill allots one Representative to each of those States.

Passing now to the thirteen remaining States, we find that this bill gives to ten of them 1 Representative each for the fractional remainder of its people over the number of times that 154,910 will go in the full number of its inhabitants; and to the three remaining States, New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, it gives 2 members each for the fractional number of people in each of these States less than 154,910. Thus: divide the whole number of the inhabitants of New York by the basis of 154,910, and it will go thirty-two times and leave a remainder of 125,751.

Now give New York a Representative for each 154,910 of her inhabitants and that great State will have 32 Representatives, and have a remaining population of a little more than 81 per cent. of the number strictly required for another Representative. Give her 1 for this large fraction and that maks 33 Representatives, and no man can deny that New York will have her full proportion of Representatives if they are to be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers. Yet this bill by a learned (?) mathematical hocus-pocus gives to New York 34 Representatives. Apply the same calculation I have indicated and Pennsylvania would have 27 Representatives, and a fractional number of people left over of 110,321, or a little over 71 per cent. of enough for another Representative. Give Pennsylvania a member for this large fraction and she would have 28 Representatives, and yet be more than equal in representative power. This bill in the plenitude of its generosity gives Pennsylvania 29 Representatives.

Again, apply the same divisor to the population of Illinois and she would get 19 Representatives, one for each 154,910 of her people, and have a fractional number over of 130,581, or a trifle more than 84 per cent. of the number entitled to a Representative. Give Illinois a member for this large fraction and she then would have 20 members on the floor of the next and succeeding Congresses. This bill gives still another, and allots to Illinois 21 Representatives!

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have seen that assuming that the number should be increased to keep pace in some degree with the advancing population of the Union, and assuming, as this bill does assume, that 320 is the proper number, then it follows that the basis of population for each number to represent should be the whole population divided by 320. That, we have seen, gives us 154,285 as the proper number of people who should inhabit a representative district as near as may be. I say as near as may be, because this number 320 being fixed as the proper number of Representatives, then the Constitution plainly and unequivocally demands that these 320 Representatives "shall be appointed among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers," yet giving to each State at least one. This the bill under debate does not do. It gives to the great States of Illinois, Pennsylvania, and New York each a member for each 154,285 of its respective inhabitants, and then for the fraction remaining in each of these States it gives a full Representative, and then, by some mathematical legerdemain, it gives them each another Representative in addition!

It reminds me of the enthusiastic Irish Democrat when the orator demanded of the crowd if one man was not as good as another. "Yes," shouted Pat, "and better too!" Does this bill apportion to New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois Representatives according to their respective numbers? I answer "Yes, and more too!" And here is where the unconstitutional unfairness and trouble comes in.

To allot to these States a Representative each more than their entire population as compared with the entire population of the Union will warrant, is not to apportion the Representatives among the States according to their respective numbers, but it is directly in defiance of the Constitution, which declares they shall be so apportioned.

Now, it is admitted that what is called "the old method" gave to each State a member for each adequate number of people, and then gave to the States having the largest remaining fractional number of people an additional Representative, beginning with the State which might have the largest fractional number, and then with the next, and so proceeding until the full number of Representatives determined on in the wisdom of Congress was rounded and complete. This gave the broadest and fairest representation possible. It left the fewest number possible of people unrepresented. It followed the letter and preserved the spirit of the Constitution. Make the basis what you will—in my judgment it should be 320, or close to that number—but let us remember that equity and fair dealing do not grow old, and that the Constitution must be obeyed. The people only desire the nearest approach possible to exact equality. They recognize the equitable maxim that equality is equity. They ask nothing more, they will be content with nothing less.

Mr. FULKERSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCCLURE.]

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will yield, I will move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I desire to offer an amendment and have it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALDRICH.) The gentleman has a right to do that under the order of the House.

The amendment of Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, is the following, as a substitute for the bill of the Committee on the Census:

A bill to fix the number of members of House of Representatives, the manner of their apportionment among the States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That in the Forty-seventh and each subsequent Congress the House of Representatives of the United States of America shall consist of 319 members.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior, upon the enumeration of the population made in 1880 and upon each subsequent enumeration of the population as provided for by the Constitution, shall, as soon as the whole number of the population of the United States is ascertained, apportion said 319 members among the several States, and immediately notify the executive of each of said States of the number of members of said House to which each State may be respectively entitled under said apportionment.

SEC. 3. Said Secretary shall make said apportionment in the following way:

First. He shall divide the total population of the United States by the whole number of Representatives and the quotient obtained shall be the ratio of representation.

Second. He shall deduct from said 319 as many members as there are States whose population upon the enumeration made is less than the ratio of representation, and assign one to each of said States respectively.

Third. After making said deduction he shall apply the ratio to the population of the several States to which no Representatives have been assigned and the quotient obtained shall be the number of Representatives to which said States are entitled on even division.

Fourth. If the number produced by even division and those assigned to the States whose population is less than the ratio does not amount when added together to the whole number of 319, then he shall assign to the State having the largest fraction on even division one of said members yet unassigned, and if two are left unassigned, then one to the next largest, and so on until all are assigned, giving said unassigned members to those States having the largest fractions.

SEC. 4. Whenever a new State is admitted into the Union, the member or members assigned said new State shall be in addition to the 319 herein provided for until the next apportionment under this bill, when the number shall again be as herein fixed.

SEC. 5. That all members of Congress hereafter elected by any State shall be elected by districts composed of contiguous territory, and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants, no district electing more than one member, and no voting precinct is to be divided in laying off said districts, and no city or county, if the districts can otherwise be practically made.

SEC. 7. Where the representation of any State is increased, such State may elect the increased number of members from the State at large to the first Congress succeeding said new apportionment. When the representation of any State is diminished, the executive of said State—unless the Legislature thereof has otherwise provided in anticipation of such diminution, and until it does provide otherwise by proclamation—may lay off said State into the requisite number of districts in the manner heretofore provided in this act, and the Representatives of said States shall be elected by the districts thus laid off in time, manner, and form as now provided by law.

SEC. 8. That notice of the apportionment by the Secretary of the Interior to the several executives of the States shall not be delayed later than August 1 of the year in which the enumeration is made, and he shall also transmit to Congress immediately on its assembling a report of the said apportionment.

SEC. 9. The enumeration of population and taking of the census shall hereafter be had and taken in April, instead of June, as provided in section 19 of the act of March 3, 1879, which section is modified to this extent.

Mr. RANDALL. If the House does not desire to adjourn at this time, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. MCCLURE. Mr. Speaker, I believe I am indebted to the generosity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] for an opportunity to take a minor part in this mathematical controversy. Has this House unalterably fixed upon 320 as the number of its members? I have heard very little discussion upon this point. I think the logical method would be to first settle the proposed size of this body.

I believe, and I avow that belief boldly, that if the American people were called upon to pronounce a collective judgment in this matter they would pronounce an overwhelming verdict against the addition of a single member to this body as now constituted, except such as might become necessary by reason of the admission of new States into the Union. If it is not patent to every member upon this floor, it is at least to every visitor that comes to this Capitol and from these galleries looks down upon your proceedings, that this body is now unwieldy and at times very difficult of management. Every member added to it, as now constituted, aggravates the existing evil. Every member added to it, as now constituted, is at the expense of the responsible, intelligent, and expeditious discharge of the public business. Is this House so fascinated with Congressional magnitude, so overcome by the grandeur of magnificent proportions, that it will sacrifice the public interests to aggrandize the size of this body? Why, if you would reduce the number of this House as now constituted, cast out from its deliberations all matters of private concern, as my experienced friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has already proposed to do, you will subserve the highest interests of the American people. The confusion is even now, at times, almost intolerable, opposing a rude impediment to the orderly transaction of the public business.

It is true I occupy an ineligible seat in the silent corner of this Hall, which has been denominated the Massachusetts of this House on account of its eminent respectability. When the distinguished gentleman from Indiana on the opposite side of the Chamber—and I know it is unparliamentary to particularize—when the distinguished gentleman rises to object to some objectionable measure, such is the intervening confusion that his voice is entirely drowned and we are deprived of the pleasure of listening to his oral discussion and compelled to go to the RECORD to keep track of his many points.

It is not a sufficient reason for the proposed increase of the members of this body to adduce the fact that the legislative bodies of Continental Europe are numerically much stronger than this House even with the accession of members contemplated in the bill. We have State governments to administer local affairs and a National Government to administer national affairs. This harmonious and beautiful distribution of the functions of government, national and local, effectually removes every reason and should silence every temptation to degrade the national House of Representatives to a mob by the constant augmentation of its numbers.

Now, if 320 is fixed upon as the number of Representatives in this body, and it is simply a question of the distribution of political power among the States, the new system is infinitely preferable to the old system. It is sufficient for me to know that under the old system in a House of 299 members Alabama gets 8, and in a House of 300 members she gets but 7. Such mathematics is contaminated with congenital infirmity. No vaccination will save it from confluent smallpox. It is crankism applied to figures. It is the Guiteauism of arithmetic. The mathematical obstetrics that will deliver such a monstrosity as this ought to be indicted for criminal malpractice. Such a system of computation in the political prize-ring of Congressional apportionment is, if I may be permitted to employ the classic nomenclature of Boston, surely afflicted with hernia. No amount of trussing will bolster it up.

I challenge the keenest master of the occult mathematics of apportionment to discover in the new system an outrage half as monstrous as this: If Alabama in a House of 299 gets 8 members, if in a House of 300 she gets 7 members, then, according to elementary arithmetic, in a House of 307 she would be entirely dismantled of representative power and reduced to the degradation of a disfranchised borough. In that case her patriotism would, of course, discountenance revolution, but her grievances would be sore indeed. And yet this system is said to be forty years old, and to be the æsthetic embodiment of the constitutional mathematics of apportionment. I understand that the gentleman from California, the energetic chairman of the Committee on Commerce, is seriously bewitched with this Chinese jugglery with figures. It will be, therefore, pertinent to observe that there is at least one virtue in the Mongolian, even from the stand-point of the Pacific slope. That the old system is crude, barbarous, unskillful, unscientific, and monstrous in its operations will hardly be denied in the face of the Alabama paradox.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to call the attention of this House to a significant circumstance. During the last calendar year over six hundred thousand foreigners have landed upon our shores. Where has this vast stream of immigration poured itself? You may draw a line commencing at the mouth of the Delaware River along the southern border of Pennsylvania, along the northern boundary of West Virginia, to the Ohio River, along the Ohio River to its mouth, through Missouri along the southern border of Kansas and Colorado, on to the Pacific. North of this line nine-tenths of these immigrants have located themselves. Now this, while it is an imaginary geographical line, is based substantially upon a great historic event. By the new system as compared with the old, the States north of this line gain 2 members on this floor, and two in the electoral college, and it is a consideration that ought not to be overlooked in this discussion.

But it may be answered that we propose to inflict a geographical wrong in order that we may acquire a geographical advantage. I dispute the proposition. I deny that the new method inflicts any injustice not inflicted by the old, and I contend that is far more equitable.

I was sitting behind the eloquent gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] the other day when he was delivering some very telling points against the new system as compared with the old. He said, in substance, if you pass from Illinois into Wisconsin you will find that it takes 20,000 more inhabitants to elect a member in Wisconsin than in Illinois. I was quite startled at that assertion; it was a sort of "swamp angel" shot from his mathematical battery. But it is not so startling after all. Take the old system. Get into a boat at New York; go down to Florida; and if you do not get sea-sick off Hatteras and are able to figure when you get to Florida, you will find it takes 20,000 less inhabitants to elect a member in Florida than it does in New York—a discrimination against New York of 600,000 inhabitants. Has the gentleman from Michigan fallen in love with Florida that he champions her cause as against the cause of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois? Is he pursuing the sunflowers of politics——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Many MEMBERS. Go on!

Mr. McCLURE. I will pay usurious interest for the loan of about two minutes more time.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that my colleague be allowed five or ten minutes more. He has not occupied the time of the House heretofore.

Mr. SPRINGER. And he is a new member.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Ohio will be allowed to proceed for five minutes longer.

Many MEMBERS. That is all right.

Mr. McCLURE. Is the eloquent gentleman from Michigan pursuing the sunflowers of politics in the arithmetic of the apportionment bill? Has he been transformed into a sort of geographical Oscar Wilde, to throw the lilies of reconciliation across the "bloody chasm," by depriving New York of equitable representative power for the benefit of Florida?

I do not speak disrespectfully of the gentleman from Michigan, because I highly appreciate his commanding ability; but what troubles me is that I cannot comprehend the "true inwardness" of his mathematical philosophy.

Now, suppose you step from New York State across Connecticut into Rhode Island. If you are sure-footed and do not miss the State, you will find that under the old system it takes 16,000 less inhabitants to elect a Representative in Rhode Island than in New York—a discrimination against New York of 500,000 in the name of constitutional apportionment!

I do not propose to go into figures. I have no aptitude for complex calculation. It is demonstrable, and, has been demonstrated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCOID,] that the new system is incomparably better than the old. There will be unavoidable discriminations in both systems. There is this difference, however, the old system injuriously discriminates against the populous States, whose inhabitants are constantly increasing, such as New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, and the new system discriminates against the minor States, whose populations are either stationary or relatively diminishing in numbers. Why, these small States who are appealing for magnanimous treatment at the hands of the large States have permitted the suggestion—I will not characterize it a threat—to go uncontradicted, that if this bill passes this House they will stifle it in the Senate by reason of their disproportionate representation in that body. They coax and crack the Senatorial whip at the same time. I am opposed to the old system because it violently discriminates against the North, which is daily receiving accessions to its population from foreign sources. While the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh Congresses have been discussing the apportionment of Representative power among the States, the vast movements of population have changed the face of affairs. What might have been speculative injustice to Rhode Island, Florida, and California in 1880 would in 1882 be gross injustice to New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, for this controversy is between these States.

I do not understand the seeming hostility of Michigan to New York in this matter. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. HORR,] whose vivacious wit and ready eloquence this House always enjoys, rushes into the arena to deliver a shot against New York on her left flank. This is strange. When the conflagration licked up the forests of Michigan, covered the sky with crimson for miles around, and with an angry hand flung the sparks and smoke down over Ohio, no State in the Union poured out with a more lavish hand unstinted benefactions on the homeless refugees of the blackened forests than the State of New York.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FULKERSON. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HERBERT.]

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Alabama will yield, I will move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield for that motion?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir; and I shall be obliged if the House should now adjourn.

Mr. SHERWIN. Before the question is taken on the motion to adjourn, I desire to present an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment can come in under the rule, and will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That after the 3d of March, 1883, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 322 members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, 8; Arkansas, 5; California, 6; Colorado, 1; Connecticut, 4; Delaware, 1; Florida, 2; Georgia, 10; Illinois, 20; Indiana, 13; Iowa, 11; Kansas, 7; Kentucky, 11; Louisiana, 6; Maine, 4; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 12; Michigan, 11; Minnesota, 5; Mississippi, 7; Missouri, 14; Nebraska, 3; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 7; New York, 33; North Carolina, 9; Ohio, 21; Oregon, 1; Pennsylvania, 28; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 6; Tennessee, 10; Texas, 10; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 10; West Virginia, 4; Wisconsin, 9.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DUNN, by unanimous consent, obtained indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 14, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. HARRISON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask leave of the Senate for the committee to sit during the sessions of the Senate. There is a matter now before the committee that ought to be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that permission be given by the Senate to the Committee on Military Affairs to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE.

Mr. HAWLEY. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers.

That is by instruction of the committee. There are two gentlemen from a distance that we do not think it quite right to summon without being able to pay them mileage.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of Lieutenant-Colonel G. K. Warren, Corps of Engineers, of examinations and surveys made in compliance with the river and harbor act of March 3, 1881, of Buzzard's Bay and Barnstable Bay, Massachusetts, at the entrance of the proposed Cape Cod Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of January 6, 1882, certain information relating to the payment of pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 813) to amend section 5254, title 63, Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the use of piers and cribs in the Mississippi River; was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 4240) supplemental to the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the final expenses of the tenth census," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE subsequently said: The House bill relating to the census, which was just now referred to the Committee on Appropriations, I think does not relate to appropriations but to something in reference to the employés; and if so it should be referred, I take it, to the Select Committee on the Census.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made, and the bill referred to the Select Committee to make provision for taking the Tenth Census and ascertaining the results thereof.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A BANK.

The bill (H. R. No. 3870) to change the name of the National Mechanics' Banking Association of New York to that of Wall Street National Bank was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. A week ago the Committee on Finance authorized me to report a similar bill favorably. This is in the usual form, and it meets the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, and it is merely to prevent a confusion of names. The names are so nearly alike of the two banks now in the city of New York that their correspondence gets constantly mixed. I therefore ask for the consideration and passage of the bill at the present time. It is a brief bill, and it will take but a moment.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1094) to change the name of the National Mechanics' Banking Association of New York to that of Wall Street National Bank, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hold in my hand forty petitions, numerously signed by citizens of over thirty counties in the State of Missouri, addressed to Congress, urging the construction of a public building at Jefferson City, the State capital of Missouri, and praying an appropriation therefor. I move that the petitions be received and laid upon the table, as my colleague [Mr. VEST] yesterday reported favorably from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds a bill for the construction of such public building.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY presented the memorial of Church E. Gates & Co. and 61 others, citizens of New York, in favor of early action on the joint resolution relating to the Harlem River improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of P. H. Clark and others, of Marine City, Michigan, vessel-owners, captains, shippers, &c., and the petition of James G. Kehoe and others, of Bay City, Michigan, praying for the establishment of a light-house at or near Point Patterson, on the northern shore of Lake Michigan, and for a re-survey of the adjacent coast; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. H. B. Kirby and 48 others, citizens of Schoolcraft, Michigan, praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution, prohibiting political distinctions on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of John C. McConnell, late colonel of the Third Regiment of Maryland Volunteers in the war for the Union, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of W. L. Bumgardner and others, citizens of Staunton and Harrisonburgh, Virginia, praying for an amendment of the existing militia law, and also for an increase of the annual appropriation for the militia; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I present the petition of the Omaha Ministerial Association, signed by its president and the secretary, praying for the passage of a law to discountenance and put an end to polygamous practices in Utah Territory. As a bill has already been reported on this subject, I believe from the Judiciary Committee, I ask that this petition lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be received and lie upon the table.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of William Hogg and 65 others, citizens of New York, praying for the passage of the joint resolution relating to the Harlem River improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONAS presented a memorial of citizens of Shreveport, and members of the Cotton Exchange of Caddo Parish, Louisiana, in favor of the passage of a bill making an appropriation for the erection of a public building in the city of Shreveport, and a bill making an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of Red River, in Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLATT presented the petition of Mrs. M. Cornelia Lanman, widow of the late Rear-Admiral Joseph Lanman, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 946) to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Brevet Major-General Edward Hatch, United States Army, chairman and disbursing officer of the special Ute commission appointed under act of Congress of May 3, 1878, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PLATT. The Committee on Pensions instruct me to report adversely upon the bill (S. No. 943) granting a bounty to W. F. Bacon, an application being pending in the Pension Office for the same bounty.

The bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 136) for the relief of Andrew J. Miller, of Texas, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 942) granting an increase of pension to James H. Reeve, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 718) granting a pension to Ellen M. Godfrey, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of T. W. Tansill, praying for a readjustment of his accounts by the Treasury Department, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 1190) for the relief of diplomatic and consular officers of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 632) granting a pension to John Taylor, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 915) granting a pension to Jesse F. Phares, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 888) granting a pension to Hoy Cooper, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 810) granting a pension to James Cooper, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 930) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the remainder of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1881, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back a memorial on behalf of the heirs and legal representatives of Captain Lambert Wickes, of the Revolutionary navy, praying for the settlement and payment of prize-money, wages, pay, &c., claimed to be due. This appears to have been referred in 1879 to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee was discharged and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. That committee appears to have been discharged, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance; but the memorial, if it belongs anywhere, clearly belongs to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I ask that the Committee on Finance be discharged from its consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1776) for the relief of Medical Director John Thornley, United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 43) granting a pension to Phœbe C. Doxsie, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 601) granting a pension to Thomas Patton, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 868) for the relief of Julia C. Ord, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 848) granting a rerating of pension to Jacob Meier, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 826) for the relief of Powers and Newman and D. & B. Powers, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1035) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union agency, Indian Territory, for services and expenses, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 866) authorizing the sale of certain logs cut by the Indians of the Menomonee reservation, in Wisconsin, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 864) to confirm certain instructions given by the Department of the Interior to the Indian agent at Green Bay agency, in the State of Wisconsin, and to legalize the acts done and permitted by said Indian agent pursuant thereto, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 281) to confirm the title to certain lands in Platte County, Missouri, and authorize patents to be issued therefor to Kinsey B. Cecil, reported it without amendment.

THE MARINE CORPS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I did not attend to the reading of the Journal, but I notice in the RECORD that as to the bill (S. No. 12) to establish and equalize the grades and regulate appointments and promotions in the Marine Corps, which was put over on account of the absence of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] who reported the bill, it is not stated that the bill was passed over without prejudice. That was the fact and I should like to have it so recorded on the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McDILL (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1191) to provide for greater economy in the public expenditure of gas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1192) to redeem tax-lien certificates upon which drawback certificates have been erroneously received in settlement in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1193) defining the rate of interest to be charged on arrearages of general and special taxes now due the District of Columbia, and the meaning and intent of acts approved June 19, 1878, and June 27, 1879, relative to the adjustment of special assessments in said District, and for certain other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S No. 1194) granting a pension to Hannah M. Wright; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1195) granting a pension to William Hazelit; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALDRICH asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1196) for the relief of Mary McMahon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1197) for the relief of William W. Webb; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1198) to establish additional post-roads in the State of Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CALL (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1199) for the registration of ships and sea-going vessels, and for the encouragement of United States shipping; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1200) for the relief of Richard H. White; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McMILLAN. I yesterday presented and had referred to the Committee on Pensions a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, recommending the granting of a pension to Captain Nix. I now ask leave to introduce a bill granting him a pension, accompanied by a statement of the facts in his case, which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Pensions.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1201) granting a pension to Jacob Nix; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1203) to exempt vessels of less than twenty-five tons on the inland waters of the United States, and not engaged in the transportation of passengers, from inspection and license under the laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1204) for the relief of L. P. Fluke; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BUTLER (by request) asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 35) for the relief of Caroline M. Seton and Mary Jeannette Sibbald, heirs-at-law of Charles F. Sibbald, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 36) for the relief of Miss Eliza A. White; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file in the case, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HARRIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3844) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. DAWES. A few days since the Senate, on a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, ordered printed the bill (S. No. 1121) to accept and ratify an agreement made and submitted by the Creek Nation of Indians for the relinquishment of a portion of their land in the Indian Territory to the United States for the use of the Seminole Nation of Indians, and for other purposes. The print was by mistake, badly executed, and I move that the bill be reprinted.

The motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. ROLLINS, it was Ordered, That William S. Mackay be authorized to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in his case now on file with the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary have leave to sit during the session of the Senate.

AMERICAN AND NICARAGUAN CLAIMS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committtee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the President be requested to bring to the attention of the Government of Nicaragua the necessity of arranging by a convention for the final settlement of all unadjusted claims existing between the Government of the United States and the Government of Nicaragua, and claims of citizens of either of said governments against the other government.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Proceedings under the Anthony rule are now in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I gave notice last Friday that I should this morning ask the Senate to consider Senate bill No. 353, relating to the crime of bigamy in the Territory of Utah and relating to the administration of the government in that Territory. The subject is so important and has been so long and often before Congress that the Committee on the Judiciary feels it to be its duty to ask the Senate to take up this bill now in the hope that we may dispose of it; and I ask that it be taken up to-day, superseding the Anthony rule for the time being, from the additional circumstance that I shall be obliged to leave the city, I think, the day after to-morrow for some days, and the committee would be glad to have this important subject disposed of before that time. I therefore ask the Senate—of course the Senate must judge whether it is right or wise to do it—to take up the bill now; and I accordingly move to postpone the present and all prior orders in order to proceed to consider this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I think I have given notice half a dozen times that as soon as the resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] was disposed of I should insist upon action in relation to the tariff-commission bill. It is obvious if any action at all is to be taken upon that bill, it should be at an early day. It ought to have been passed before this time, and but for the interference of other measures, and Senators asking permission to make speeches upon one subject and another, it would have received action, I am confident, before now. I take it that everybody is ready to vote upon the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, and I hope that he will insist upon having that, as it is the unfinished business, acted upon this morning, so that we can take up some measures of actual business.

Mr. INGALLS. That resolution does not come before the Senate until half past one. The junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] asks that the Anthony rule may be laid aside and that this bill may be considered during the morning hour.

Mr. MORRILL. To that I do not object.

Mr. HOAR. What is the bill which the Senator from Vermont proposes to take up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 353) to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. I am very unwilling to antagonize any request of that Senator, or any other, but it seems to me it would be entirely impossible to dispose, and nobody can expect to dispose, of that most important matter in what remains of the morning hour after the routine business, in two days. I understand that the request of the Senator from Vermont is that the business under the Anthony rule may be laid aside in order that this remaining scrap of the morning hour may be devoted to this matter for the next two days, on the ground that after that he is to be absent himself. It seems to me manifest that that bill can hardly be read through in half the time we have left this morning.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, why would it not be far better to allow the Calendar to proceed during the morning hour? The Senator from Kansas can then very courteously yield to the junior Senator from Vermont to take up his bill so as to accommodate his convenience, and as he has stated that he will be unable to be here long, I think the Senator from Kansas would be very willing to do that. If we break in upon the Anthony rule we cease to take up the cases on the Calendar, in which all are interested. We succeeded yesterday in disposing of quite a number of cases on the Calendar, and we shall do so each day unless it is broken in upon from day to day. If we allow this to be done to-day, some Senator will have a reason why it should be broken in upon to-morrow. I think we had better adhere to the Anthony rule each day and then accommodate Senators in other ways. I think the Senator from Kansas, who is very generous, will be glad to yield his business temporarily in order to take up the polygamy bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I have been very courteously yielding my right to action on this resolution for over a month. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] has given notice that at half past one to-day he desires to take up a measure local to his own State and submit some remarks upon it; and I trust, in order that we may proceed in an orderly way to the transaction of the public business, that action may be taken at half-past one upon the resolution I have offered, and then the Senate would be in readiness to take up any measure that a majority may see fit to discuss.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has misunderstood the effect of the motion that I have made, which is to postpone the present and all prior orders to proceed to the consideration of this Utah bill. I explained to the Senate that it was for the Senate to determine whether it could consider it or not. If my motion is agreed to, I take it that the present and all prior orders will be postponed and that this bill will therefore have the run until the Senate choose to dispose of it by taking up something else in its place. If that is not the effect of it, as I think it is, then when one o'clock comes it is due to my friend from Kansas that I should say that I shall feel it to be a duty to again move to take it up. Therefore I ask that a vote of the Senate may be taken now whether they are willing to consider this bill or not. If they are not, the duty of the Committee on the Judiciary is done until the bill is reached in its order next year or some other year in the regular way.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from Vermont understand that a motion made in the morning hour to postpone existing orders not only postpones the Calendar, but also prevents the laying before the Senate of the unfinished business at half past one, and postpones that without any other order? I do not so understand the practice of this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the motion now is to postpone the Anthony rule. When half past one comes, there is another order of business, which can be postponed at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope that no order will be made that will interfere with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] who has frequently given notice of his desire to avail himself of the earliest opportunity of making a speech on the subject of the tariff. I hope the Senate will not be so discourteous to the Senator, after he has waited patiently for other matters to be disposed of, as to make any order that will interfere with him making the speech he desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to postpone the Anthony rule, which will be followed, if it is postponed, by asking the Senate to take up what is called the anti-polygamy bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY. I shall vote against suspending the Anthony rule, not because I am opposed to voting on the proposition that the junior Senator from Vermont proposes to bring before the Senate, because I am with him on that question. I shall vote against polygamy and the Mormon question whenever I have an opportunity; but I think breaking in upon the Anthony rule is destructive to not only the convenience but the efficiency of the Senate and the progress of the business of the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the Senator from Michigan misapprehends the effect of the motion of the Senator from Vermont. It does not supersede or suspend the Anthony rule, as I understand it. The bill to which the Senator from Vermont referred, and which is the subject of this motion, is on the Calendar; and the only difference is that we proceed to consider a bill which is not the first on the Calendar.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator will pardon me for saying that that is the point I am trying to guard against. If the Senate allows each member to ask to take up a particular bill, then we do not go to the Calendar and take bills up in their order, and it will simply depend upon the activity of any Senator here. The Anthony rule is to take up the unobjected cases in their order, and I propose to stick by my friend from Rhode Island.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the motion of the Senator from Vermont will perhaps expedite business much more than any other course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FAIR, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. JONES, of Nevada.]

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VANCE, (when Mr. RANSOM's name was called.) I rise to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is confined to his room by indisposition.

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] on all questions. I do not regard this as a political question, and therefore I wish to have my vote recorded in the negative.

Mr. FRYE, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I inadvertently voted. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Sherman,
Bayard,	Garland,	McDill,	Van Wyck,
Blair,	Hale,	McMillan,	Windom.
Conger,	Harris,	Miller of N. Y.,

Fair,	Ingalls,	Miller of Cal.,
Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Mitchell,

So the motion was not agreed to.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will proceed to the consideration of cases on the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. SLATER. Yesterday when we reached the bill (S. No. 126) to reimburse the Creek orphan fund it will be remembered that I asked that it might be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar, on account of the absence of papers. I ask that that bill be called first this morning.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the bill on the Calendar which was taken up and partly considered will be disposed of first.

Mr. SLATER. Certainly, I withdraw my request until that bill is acted on.

CORNELIA A. SHULTZ.

Mr. TELLER. I ask permission to make a report at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

Mr. TELLER. The Committee on Pensions have had under consideration the petition of Cornelia A. Shultz, praying to be allowed a pension, and direct me to report adversely thereon.

Mr. BLAIR. There is a minority report in that case, and on behalf of the minority I desire leave to present their views and ask that they be printed with the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views of the minority will be printed.

Mr. BLAIR. Let the bill go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is adverse.

Mr. BLAIR. I will make a short statement, which will explain the matter. The applicant files her petition, which is referred to the committee; the committee report adversely upon the petition; the minority, in behalf of whom I present views, favor the petition and report a bill in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A bill can only be reported by a majority of a committee.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask leave, then, as I stated in the first place, to report the views of the minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can be done. The petition is reported adversely, and the report will be printed.

Mr. HOAR. Allow me to suggest that the adverse report upon the petition goes upon the Calendar. With that can be printed the views of the minority, which also contain the bill they recommend. The bill has no parliamentary standing; it is merely a part of the views of the minority, unless it is adopted by the Senate as a substitution for the majority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understands. Petitions are not put on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the report may be put on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It cannot, because the report does not propose any action of the Senate in a form to be voted on.

Mr. TELLER. The minority report does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the minority of a committee cannot propose a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts seems to the Chair the most proper one, that the Senator from New Hampshire submit his adverse views to those of the majority, accompanied by a bill which can go upon the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. The Senate must act one way or the other on the report upon this petition by a majority of the committee. Now, the question which is to be taken, whether the petition shall be indefinitely postponed or denied, which if there was no adverse report would be taken as a matter of course, may itself by direction of the Senate be placed upon the Calendar of business and considered when it is reached. That is the proposition which I make, that the Senate unanimously consent to placing upon the Calendar this report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nothing, I submit, can be put on the Calendar except something which calls for a vote of the Senate on its face. If the majority of the committee reporting adversely on this petition had reported a resolution "Resolved by the Senate that this thing or that thing be done," undoubtedly the resolution could go upon the Calendar either of resolutions, or the other things, no matter which, on the Calendar; but they have not done that. Now the Senator from New Hampshire, if he is the gentleman reporting the minority views, wants a bill and has reported that bill or brought it to the Senate. All that he needs to do is as a member to have leave now at this moment to introduce that bill, which really comes from the minority, and it is read the first time and placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. When there is an adverse report upon a petition, the petition has been before the Senate, it has been referred to a committee, and when the adverse report returns, its acceptance, whether it passes as a matter of course, as it ordinarily does, or otherwise, is an act of the Senate indefinitely postponing the further consideration of that petition. That may go upon the Calendar to be acted upon when it is reached, as well as to be acted upon in the morning hour when the committee makes its report. That is my point. But the Senator from Vermont says that that thing cannot be done unless there is to be some action of the Senate. There is to be action of the Senate; and what difference does it make whether it is reported in the form of a resolution or reported orally?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it does make a difference.

Mr. HOAR. I think it does not. That is where we differ point blank, toto cœlo. I suppose it is not unparliamentary to differ with the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is when you are wrong. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. The ordinary course of dealing with these petitions which affect very important private rights and very important public rights and public interests is, when the committee are unanimous, to vote without any written report or resolution the indefinite postponement of the consideration. That is an act of the Senate. The Senator from Colorado makes his report in writing. The recommendation comes in writing, although there is no special resolution. That may go upon the Calendar, and with it may go the minority report; and that, it seems to me, is the proper way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The usual way is for a committee to report back adversely on a bill—there has been no bill referred to the committee in this case—and then that bill goes on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. There is not any bill here; there is a petition that was referred by the Senate to the committee. Now, the committee come back and say they recommend that the prayer of the petition be not granted, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. That requires the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that in his opinion the Senator should offer the bill to the Senate as his bill, and have it read twice and placed on the Calendar with his views.

Mr. BLAIR. I shall be glad to follow any suggestion of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator from Vermont is right in saying that there must be some affirmative action proposed in everything that goes on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. Can I ask, then, unanimous consent to introduce this bill, and that it be read the first and second time, and placed on the Calendar and printed, accompanied by the majority report and the views of the minority on the petition?

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the Chair what, in that case, becomes of the report of the majority of the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority of the committee report adversely on the petition.

Mr. HOAR. The objection to the suggestion of the Chair—the Chair will permit me to point it out—is this: there will have been an adverse action of the Senate upon the case, and the Senator from New Hampshire will be put in the position of having a unanimous adverse action of the Senate indefinitely postponing the petition, or accepting the report of the committee, which is the same thing, and of introducing a bill which not only is to be considered for the first time as a new subject, but reverses a previous action of this body. That is the objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can have the bill referred to the Committee on Pensions and reported back adversely.

Mr. BLAIR. That could be done, but I ask something else. I ask unanimous consent to introduce my bill, that it now receive its first and second readings, and be placed on the Calendar and printed, accompanied by the adverse report of the committee and the views of the minority; let them all be printed together.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator has a right to introduce a bill at any time during the morning hour. I do not see why he wishes to ask unanimous consent of the Senate; that is his own right. He proposes to introduce a bill here and follow it with a report; that is his privilege and right.

Mr. BLAIR. I did not suppose I could introduce a bill originally and accompany it by these reports; but the committee has considered the subject and has acted, and, by unanimous consent of the Senate, it seems to me I could introduce the bill at this time, have it read twice and placed on the Calendar in due order and printed, accompanied by the majority and minority reports, so as to place the whole matter before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Let that be done.

Mr. TELLER. There is not any trouble about this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. TELLER. The committee make a report upon which the Senate must act. It must either adopt the report or reject it. It is usual to adopt it instantaneously on the report being made when it is an adverse report, but the Senate may refuse to do that, may put it on the Calendar, and then the question will come up whether they will adopt the report of the committee, or whether they will give the petitioner further relief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. We do not ask any action to be taken now. As a matter of courtesy to the minority we ask that it remain on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. But I ask unanimous consent for the purpose I have indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can introduce his bill if he wishes.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that privilege at this time, that unanimous consent be given to introduce this bill, have it read twice, placed on the Calendar, and printed, accompanied by the reports of the majority and minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire, out of the regular order, asks leave to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 1202) granting a pension to Cornelia A. Shultz; and it was read twice by its title, and placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. Now let the rest of my request be granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be printed of course. If there be no objection the Senator can have the views of the minority printed with the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. That was part of the unanimous consent which I asked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to that request.

Mr. TELLER. In order to save the clerks any trouble in making an entry in the case of Cornelia A. Shultz, I ask leave to offer a resolution to go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado in relation to the adverse report made by him upon the petition of Cornelia A. Shultz accompanies it with a resolution, which will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the petition of Cornelia A. Shultz for a pension be denied, and the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar; and the views of the minority, with the report of the committee, will be printed, but not printed in connection with the bill, which would be rather out of order.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to inquire what alteration has been made in the disposition of the bill I introduced?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee is on the Calendar in the shape of a resolution denying the prayer of the petition, and upon that the views of the minority and the majority are both printed; and the bill goes upon the Calendar, but unaccompanied by any report, which is irregular, because the bill has not been before the committee, and the Senator has not a right to make a report from a committee on a bill not before it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (H. R. No. 2341) for the relief of colored emigrants; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 89) to print the eulogies delivered in the House of Representatives upon the late Fernando Wood.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2341) for the relief of colored emigrants; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 89) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Fernando Wood, Matt. H. Carpenter, and Ambrose E. Burnside.

CHARLES P. CHOUTEAU.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 184) for the relief of Charles P. Chouteau, the pending question being on the amendment reported from the Committee on Claims, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Court of Claims be authorized to grant a rehearing in the case of Charles P. Chouteau, surviving partner of Chouteau, Harrison & Valle, and William A. Steele, against the United States, with jurisdiction to hear and determine the amount, if any, due under the contract for the construction of the iron-clad vessel Etlah, by reason of the delays occasioned in such construction by the acts of the Government beyond the period specified in the contract, or for extras beyond what was provided therein. If upon such rehearing a receipt dated April 24, 1866, shall be given in evidence, the court may give judgment for such sum as shall be justly and equitably due notwithstanding such receipt.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to be permitted to make a brief statement before the report is read, by which the Senate can understand it better. The contractors of whose claim Mr. Chouteau is now the representative contracted in the year 1863 to build one of two iron-clad vessels on a principle then devised by the Chief Engineer of the Navy, which were to be completed within a certain time, a period of eight months, the contract reserving to the Government the right to vary as much as it pleased the plan and design of these vessels. The original contract price of each was to be $300,000. The Government intended by reserving that right to reserve the right to entirely reconstruct and reform the whole scheme on which these vessels were planned. I read from the testimony of the Chief Engineer of the Navy Department:

> It should be borne in mind that at the time this contract was entered into iron-clads were yet an experiment. It was desired to reserve to the Government the most unlimited power to change its plans. Each naval battle brought new light and valuable experience to the officers in charge of the construction of this class of war vessels.
> Chief Engineer Stimers was sent to Charleston in April, 1863, to watch the bombardment of that city. Upon his return he reported the result of his observations to the Secretary of the Navy. He says:
> "It was decided that we should make the improvements as we went along, although we fully appreciated that it would delay their completion and add to their cost. Assistant Secretary Fox made the remark that he thought following this course would probably entail an extra cost of a million dollars for each battle we had where the monitors were engaged."

The Navy Department directed such a change in this plan that it more than doubled the cost of the vessel, and required instead of eight months, which was the original time in which the contractor had prepared himself to complete the vessel, a period of some twenty-four months, the final work not being completed until about two years after it was begun, and that being entirely occasioned by changes in the plans by the Government, and without complaint on its part. The petitioner's claim rests on the testimony of officers of the Navy——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask——

Mr. HOAR. Why break in in the middle of my statement? I cannot very well take up the thread if I am interrupted. I will give the Senator any information after completing my narrative, which will be in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has but five minutes.

Mr. HOAR. I shall have to ask the Senate to extend my time two or three minutes.

Mr. President, when the contract was completed the question arose whether under the contract first the contractor was entitled to the extra cost, but that really was not questioned, because it was clearly provided in the contract that all the extra work should be paid for. The question then arose whether, in addition to compensation for the extra work, he was to be entitled to compensation for the increased prices of labor and materials occasioned in performing the work on so much of the vessel as was embraced in the original contract by postponing the time of its execution by the order of the Government from eight months to twenty-four months, or whatever was the precise length of the time. That question he submitted to the Court of Claims, and the Court of Claims decided it in his favor. The chief engineer of the Navy Department thought it ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that he may have five minutes longer time. If there be no objection, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. HOAR. That being the case, at the hearing before the Court of Claims which decided the entire claim of this petitioner upon the merits in his favor, there was presented a receipt which purported to be given at the time of the last payment—there were payments of 75 per cent. of the amount due as they went along, as the contract was partially completed—a receipt which the Court of Claims construed to be a receipt in full for all demands against the Government. The petitioner's counsel was very much surprised, but he did not ask time; he felt very clear in his opinion, and he went to the Supreme Court, and they concurred with the Court of Claims in regard to that receipt. The facts about the receipt were these: these contractors dwelling in Saint Louis had left with a New York banker authority to receive these payments in money from time to time as the work went on, and no other authority whatever. The Government made out, as the officer testified, not intending to cut off the petitioner from this large further sum due under his contract, this form of receipt, sent it to that banker, and he signed it, and received that money. Thus, without the intention of either party, as is most fully and absolutely proved to the unanimous satisfaction of the committee, the Government had in its possession what purported to be a receipt in full when it had only paid a portion of a claim which, beyond all question of cavil or peradventure, is justly, equitably, and legally due to the petitioner. The contractor for the other vessel, under precisely the same circumstances, has received relief by act of Congress.

Now, under those circumstances the committee were clearly and unanimously of opinion that the Government ought not to avail itself of that technicality, but we have not undertaken to pay the petitioner this sum of money. We say that he may have another trial in the Court of Claims, and if that receipt be there presented the court shall have authority to inquire into the facts and to award him such sum as shall seem to the Court of Claims justly and equitably his due, notwithstanding the technical effect which the law gives to the phraseology of that receipt. That is the whole case.

Mr. HALE. All he really desires is to allow the Court of Claims to go behind that receipt?

Mr. HOAR. That is all; that is the precise case. Now I will answer the question of my friend from Florida.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I simply desire to know if this case belongs to that class of cases which were submitted to the judgment and determination of a board created for the purpose of ascertaining what was due the parties for extra work upon the iron-clads. This subject was before the Committee on Naval Affairs since I have been a member, and since then it has passed to the Committee on Claims. There were a large number of cases, involving a very large sum of money, in which payments have already been made under awards rendered by competent authority created to inquire into the amount of compensation the contractors were entitled to for the extra work done on those ships. Money, as I understood, in some cases was received, full payments, and after that many of the contractors have come forward and asked permission to go before the Court of Claims and receive additional compensation. Is this case one of that class?

Mr. HOAR. This is not one of that class. This case was not submitted to that tribunal. The Court of Claims had jurisdiction over it, it being there pending, and as I said, the Court of Claims having decided this man's claim on its merits in his favor. This is not a case where it is sought to retry the judgment of anybody as to the amount due this petitioner. The Navy Department, the petitioner, and the Court of Claims are agreed that every dollar of his present demand is his just due, and by a sheer mistake of a New York banker, authorized only to receive these payments from time to time, on the receipt of a partial payment a paper amounting technically to a receipt in full (though there is a great deal of doubt on that question in my jndgment) was received by the Government.

Mr. HALE. About how much does it involve?

Mr. HOAR. It is over $100,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this presents the question of an interference by Congress with the regular administration of proceedings in courts of justice. It seems, according to the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, that through a mistake of the counsel of the claimant when his case was in court and when he might have shown that this so-called discharge or receipt in full was given by a person who had no authority to give such a receipt and was not therefore a bar to his claim, he did not make that proof.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; that is not the case at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says that is not the case. Then we will take it that I am mistaken and that he undertook to make the proof and failed to make it. Then a court of justice has decided that this was a receipt in full, understandingly given, and designed to accomplish the purpose that it carried on its face. It must be one way or the other, it appears to me, and I certainly understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the counsel ——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will pardon me a single second. The counsel, I understood the Senator to say, was so confident that the legal effect of this instrument was not a bar that he at once carried the case up to the Supreme Court, but to his surprise the judgment was affirmed. Therefore I assume that he did not undertake in the Court of Claims to go into proof to show the circumstances under which this receipt was given. Very well; then it comes to the mistake of counsel having too strong a reliance upon the law points to produce evidence which he thinks might have overcome the effect of this paper.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know how long the Senator desires to proceed under a mistaken apprehension of what I stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I desire to proceed long enough to see if I can understand what the Senator did state. I thought I understood it before.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the statement is this—the Senator will pardon me: the banker in New York very likely had technical authority to sign receipts and to bind this man; I do not understand that that is questioned; but the purpose of his employment was simply to enable him to receive deposits of money, to be drawn out as if he had left it with the cashier of a bank. The banker had no knowledge of the condition of the contract; he did not intend to act in pursuance of an authority to bind this man by giving a receipt in full. The mistake of the lawyer was in going on in the Court of Claims, too confident that that receipt did not technically bind his client, instead of obtaining a stay of proceedings till he could appeal to Congress or some other public authority.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not see that the Senator from Massachusetts has changed his previous statement at all. Either this New York banker had authority to bind his correspondent, this claimant, by giving a discharge in full, or he had not. I think I may safely assume that I am right about that. If he had authority, then he did choose for the sake of getting the money he did to discharge this claim in full; and it was the discharge of his client, his constituent, because his constituent had authorized him to do that thing. If that is the state of the case, then Congress is called upon, as it might be in every case that has been decided in the Supreme Court or the circuit courts of the United States or in the Court of Claims, anywhere where the United States are parties, to re-try every question and undertake to sit as a court of appeal. I am afraid we cannot very well do that in all cases. If on the other hand——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of half past one has arrived.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the pending order be laid aside, that the Senator may proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont may proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. INGALLS. Is this motion for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Vermont to conclude his remarks?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so supposes.

Mr. INGALLS. To that I have no objection, but I do object to the regular order being displaced by any other business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before I conclude my remarks, lest I should not have the pleasure of being here when this bill comes up again, I move to amend the amendment of the committee by adding at the end of it these words:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as any admission of any facts whatever by the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So as to leave the Court of Claims not compromised, as they have been sometimes, by the phraseology of bills on these questions.

Mr. HOAR. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to add that if this case depended upon the real authority of the banker and that authority did not exist, and the counsel by a mere slip, having thought that the effect of the paper was not injurious to his client, failed to put in the evidence, that may make a special and peculiar case we might safely perhaps act upon; but the effect, I am afraid, of this phraseology in the committee's amendment as to that receipt will be to set it aside altogether by a sheer edict of Congress:

If upon such rehearing a receipt dated April 24, 1866, shall be given in evidence, the court may give judgment for such sum as shall be justly and equitably due notwithstanding such receipt.

If it is to be claimed that the effect of this is to withdraw from that court the trial of the question whether that receipt was understandingly given by this claimant, either personally or through his agent, so that he is fairly and justly bound by it, then I think Congress is going too far by an edict of that character. It is undertaking to try over again, as I said before, all these questions. If the effect of it is only intended to be—and perhaps that would be all that it might be with this amendment I have proposed—to leave it to that court to try the question as a court of equity might as to the circumstances under which that receipt was given, so that if in point of law and equity it is not binding upon the party, they may proceed, that is another thing.

I apologize, Mr. President, for having taken up any time at all.

Mr. HOAR. I accept the Senator's amendment, as far as I can, for the committee. I have no doubt the Senate will unanimously agree to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee on Claims.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to dispose of the bill?

Mr. INGALLS. If there is to be no discussion, I have no objection to a vote on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Claims as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEPOSITS FOR LAND SURVEYS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. With the permission of the Senate, and for the purpose of submitting a few remarks, I propose on Thursday next after the morning hour to move the consideration of the resolution submitted by me on the 26th of January, relative to the survey of public lands under the deposit system.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS ACT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. INGALLS on the 12th of January:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the act of January 25, 1879, commonly known as the arrears of pensions act, ought not to be repealed.

The pending question being on the following amendment of Mr. BUTLER as modified:

And that Congress ought to enact a law granting a pension to the needy or disabled soldiers of the Mexican war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President I understand that some Senators have given notice of a desire to make some regular remarks, and while I do not intend to interfere with the usual courtesy of the Senate about remarks, I wish to move—which will not interfere with their speech-making—to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the Utah bill to which I before referred. Pending that motion it is in order of course for gentlemen who wish, to make their remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont does not wish the sense of the Senate taken now on his motion?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to deprive gentlemen who I understand desire at this time to make some remarks, of the opportunity of doing so. If there are no persons who wish to make remarks,——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] is on the floor and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] also gave notice of a desire to submit some remarks.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has no objection to laying aside temporarily the unfinished business.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the Senator from Vermont has made a motion. My attention was temporarily diverted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My motion was to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding with the Utah bill.

Mr. INGALLS. That motion is not in order under the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I respectfully submit that it is.

Mr. INGALLS. I respectfully submit that it is not, and I call the attention of the Chair to Rule 43, which provides what motions can be made when a question is pending, and among them the motion submitted by the Senator from Vermont is not to be found.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the motion, and move to postpone the further consideration of this resolution until to-morrow. If that carries, I shall move to take up the Utah bill.

Mr. INGALLS. That is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not waste any time in discussing what is in order. I do not wish to interfere with my friend from Oregon at all.

COLUMBIA RIVER IMPROVEMENT, ETC.

Mr. SLATER. In pursuance of notice given yesterday, and also at a previous date, I now ask to call up the memorial of the people of Oregon and Washington Territory to the Congress of the United States for the improvement of the navigation of Columbia and Willamette Rivers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That memorial will be regarded as before the Senate, no objection being made.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President, my object in addressing the Senate at this time is, if possible, to attract the attention of Senators to the importance of the Columbia River in its relation to the commerce of the country, and particularly its importance to the now rapidly developing commerce of that northwest section of the country, in advance of the time when the annual appropriation bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors shall be before the Senate for its consideration; for experience has taught me that after it has once reached this Chamber but little opportunity is or can be afforded for the discussion of any item of appropriation that bill may contain, and the fate of propositions looking to an increase of any of its appropriations or to the addition of new matter is practically decided without reference to their importance or value to the country. I am aware, sir, of the great difficulty of gaining for that remote section the consideration it so justly merits at the hands of this body, from the fact that matters of moment in a national point of view, and the claims of each constituency, so press upon Senators' time and attention that they naturally, and I might say from necessity, put aside everything that is not forced upon their consideration. Somebody has said or written that "Distance lends enchantment to the view;" and it may be true in a poetical sense, but it will hardly do to apply the sentiment to the attention given by this Government to its remote sections and their interests. Indeed, sir, in this respect it may be truthfully said that distance obscures legislative vision and darkens Congressional understanding.

Mr. President, the Columbia is the second largest river in the United States; but comparison with the Mississippi River furnishes, and can furnish, no adequate understanding of the importance of the former as compared with the latter, from the fact that the conditions and surroundings of the Columbia are wholly different from the surroundings and conditions of the Mississippi. The country drained by the Mississippi, from its mouth to the farthest point where steamboats have reached, flows almost uninterruptedly through a level or gently undulating country, with but slight obstructions, and they far up and approximately near its source. The Mississippi in its course crosses at right angles the course of commerce which flows when and wherever it can from east to west. Whereas the Columbia, from its source to its mouth, flows through a section of gigantic mountain ranges, is frequently obstructed by falls and rapids, and within about one hundred and fifty miles of the sea it breaks through the Cascade range of mountains, which extend from the California line to British Columbia, unbroken by any stream save and except the Columbia River. The general course of the Columbia is from east to west, the direct and in all that section the necessary direction and course of commerce. Of the 250,000 square miles of territory drained by the Columbia, and east of the Cascade range, everything that comes into that section or goes out, except stock that may walk in or out, must come in or go out through the gateway made by the Columbia in its passage through those mountains. In this section lies all of Eastern Oregon, two-thirds of the entire area of the State; all of Eastern Washington, fully two-thirds of the area of that Territory; all of Idaho, and all of Montana west of the Rocky Mountains. In this area of country there are now from 125,000 to 150,000 people, and the number is daily swelling; but these are but the first wave of the vast concourse of people running into millions that in a few years will be found there.

Already the commerce of that section passing down the Columbia seaward is very considerable, and is increasing with great rapidity. For the twelve months ending June 30, 1881, the freight passing up and down the Columbia River, through the outlet of that river in its passage through the Cascade Mountains, was 268,045 tons, and the four following months of July, August, September, and October, 1881, the freight passing up and down this river to and from points east of the Cascade range to Portland was 241,758 tons, against 94,658 tons for the same period the previous year, showing an increase at the rate of 260 per cent. Of course the value of this commerce cannot be stated in dollars and cents. There is one item, however, of export that may be approximately stated and forms the largest item of those exports, and as I find it summed up in a newspaper item as coming from the only source which could possibly give anything like an accurate statement, I give it as I find it and feel confident that it is below rather than above the correct figures. It is as follows:

PORTLAND, December 28, 1881.

From the general freight agent of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company the following figures of the Eastern Oregon and Washington wheat surplus are obtained: the amount of the crop of 1881 moved to Portland from July 1 to December 20, of wheat and flour, was 62,732 tons. There stood at the stations on the line of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company on December 20 awaiting shipment, including 2,000 tons of flaxseed, 49,356 tons of wheat. The total surplus for 1881 is 112,098 tons.

From this it will be seen that the surplus of wheat in Eastern Oregon and Washington Territory for 1881 amounted to nearly 4,000,000 bushels. Wool is another item of export from this section. What the exact figures are I am unable to state, but it must amount to some millions of pounds. It is safe to say that the value of the outward freight from this section in 1881 was four or five million dollars.

The fact that far-seeing and clear-sighted capitalists are putting many millions of capital into the construction of railroads leading into and out of the great Columbia basin is, however, the best test of its present and prospective importance. Within the last two years the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, under the control and management of Mr. Villard, has built eastward from The Dalles some two hundred and fifty miles of standard gauge railway, and has now under contract and to be completed this year one hundred and seventy miles more from Umatilla Landing, a point one hundred miles east of The Dalles, to Baker City. This last section is reaching out to meet the Oregon Short Line, now being constructed from Granger, on the Union Pacific, northwestward to Oregon.

During this period of two years the North Pacific Railway Company has also completed some two hundred and fifty miles northeastward from Wallula Junction to Lake Pen d'Orielle, connecting with the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company system at the first-named point. There is now completed and in operation in the Columbia basin over five hundred miles of railway, some one hundred and seventy more miles under contract to be completed the present year, all of which is eastward of The Dalles at the eastern base of the Cascade Mountains, and the stretch from The Dalles to the city of Portland, a distance of one hundred and ten miles, is to be completed and in operation early next summer. In addition to this it is now confidently expected that the Oregon Short Line will be completed to Baker City, Oregon, by the fall of 1883, at which point it is to connect with the Villard system, and the North Pacific, now being pushed with great energy, is expected also to be completed by the fall of 1883. So that when the lines now in process of construction shall be completed two great transcontinental lines will pass all their through freight and passengers down the Columbia River and through the gateway it makes in its passage through the Cascade Mountains.

These facts speak in terms that cannot be mistaken, with reference to the developments now in progress, and which are to continue in an increasing ratio for years to come. Why, sir, the data I have already given shows that during the four months, July, August, September, and October last, 2,000 tons of freight passed up and down the Upper Columbia daily, and with the developments now taking place, and to continue, it is no exaggeration to say that within a short period of time, certainly not to exceed three years, there will be five or six thousand tons moving daily through that great natural gateway, and a very large passenger travel. Of the natural resources of that section I shall say but little. They are very great and practically untouched so far as development is concerned. The greatest and most important, however, are its agricultural and pastoral resources, and these are not excelled, if they are equaled, by any section of the United States. Within one hundred miles of the navigable waters of the Columbia River and its tributary, Snake River, there are certainly not less than ten or twelve million acres of the most productive wheat lands in America. If but one-fourth of these lands were laid in wheat in one season the product of even an ordinary crop would exceed fifty million bushels.

The rapid increase in the product of wheat in this section may be seen by comparing the surplus of 1881, now known to be about four million bushels, with the census reports of 1880, by which it will be seen that that surplus was 50 per cent. greater than the entire product reported in the census of 1880. This surplus and the continually increasing surplus to come from these great resources must pass outward either upon the waters of the Columbia or upon the railway line now constructed and being constructed immediately upon its banks, and passing through the gateway that great river makes in its passage through the Cascade Range, and that gateway commanding as it does the carrying and transportation facilities of a section larger than all New England with New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia added, larger than the combined area of the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and Iowa, is to-day absolutely in the hands and under the control of one railroad king and the corporations of which he is the head.

The Columbia River, and the pass of the Cascade Mountains through which it runs, is as completely in the control of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company as if that company owned the title and franchise thereto. It is held, not by virtue of any law or statute, but by virtue of the conditions which are found there, caused by obstructions which interrupt the navigation of the Columbia River at two points, some fifty miles apart, around which portages have to be made. The first of these obstructions is at the Cascades, about one hundred and seventy miles from its mouth, where a land portage of five miles has to be made, which for years has been accomplished by railway. The other obstruction is fifty miles above, at the eastern base of the Cascade Mountains, where another portage of some fourteen miles has to be made, which has also been accomplished since the summer of 1863 by rail. These portage links of railway were first constructed by the Oregon Steam Navigation Company in 1862-'63, and from the time of their construction every effort to establish a competing line of transportation on the Columbia eastward from Portland has been crushed or bought off. The Oregon Railway and Navigation Company succeeded to the rights and franchises of the former company two or three years since, and by virtue of these rights and the conditions referred to, and the construction of the railway I have heretofore referred to, is king and autocrat of the situation.

Mr. President, if there were no complaint of the abuse of powers so extensive and exclusive as these now in the hands of this corporation affecting such large and extensive interests, and which are daily increasing, and which in the near future will be simply enormous, wise statesmanship should lose no time in placing every safeguard around the people to protect them from the possibility of harm from the abuse of corporate power so enthroned and fortified as this colossus is. It is not necessary to inquire into or question the manner in which this corporation acquired its rights and franchises, but only the fact that it is master of the situation and without restraint other than its own interests may dictate and enforce, as there is and can be no competition with its business of transportation, either by water or rail, until these obstructions are removed or overcome, as it controls both the river and railway.

Mr. President, we do not ask Congress to legislate on the subject of fares or freight in this case. There is a remedy more potent, more elastic, and better calculated to remove the difficulties which circumstances and the conditions of nature have placed in the way of cheap, or at least reasonably cheap, transportation down the Columbia River, both by water and by rail, and that remedy is the removal of the obstructions in the Columbia at the Cascades and at The Dalles.

That done, and extortionate charges for fares or freight would be simply impossible for any considerable length of time. Make that river free for any one who will build a steamboat and run it and it will do for all that vast region lying between the Rocky Mountains on the east and the Cascade Mountains on the west, and drained by the Columbia, what the Erie Canal has done for New York and all the Northwest States bordering on the great lakes, and what the recent improvements of the Mississippi have done and are doing for that western portion of the country which concentrates its business and its commerce at the city of Saint Louis. I have here a table taken from the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics showing the freight rates on wheat from Chicago to New York from 1868 to 1880 inclusive:

Average rates per bushel.

Years	By lake and canal.	By lake and rail.	By all rail.
			During the season of navigation only.	During the year.
1868	25.3	29.0	.....	42.6
1869	24.1	25.0	.....	35.1
1870	17.5	22.0	.....	33.3
1871	21.6	25.0	.....	31.0
1872	26.6	28.0	32.7	38.5
1873	19.2	26.9	29.9	33.2
1874	14.2	16.9	26.9	28.7
1875	11.4	14.6	23.7	24.1
1876	9.7	11.8	12.0	16.5
1877	7.5	15.8	19.9	20.3
1878	10.1	11.4	15.4	17.7
1879	13.0	13.3	15.8	17.3
1880	13.2	15.7	18.3	19.7

This table shows that water transportation by canal and lakes between the points named has been from 19 to 68 per cent. less than all-rail transportation, and for nine years, from 1872 to 1880, inclusive, it averaged 46.9 per cent. less than all-rail transportation, and for the three years of 1878, 1879, and 1880 it averaged 37 per cent. less.

The difference of all-water transportation from Saint Louis via New Orleans to Liverpool, and by rail and water via New York, is so clearly told by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics that I shall simply reproduce what he says, as follows:

Mr. Morgan also states that upon the opening of navigation in the month of March, 1881, and for some time thereafter, the through rate from Saint Louis to Liverpool was as high as 26½ cents per bushel on wheat, while the rate by rail via New York and thence by steamer to Liverpool was about 35 cents. He states, however, that since the first rush ended, freights have gradually declined until on the 31st of May the rate from Saint Louis to Liverpool via the Mississippi River was only 18½ cents per bushel on wheat, whereas at the same time by the rail route via Atlantic seaports it was about 30 cents per bushel, a difference of 11½ cents per bushel in favor of the river route.

Mr. John King, jr., late first vice-president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, in his report to the joint executive committee of east and west trunk lines, under date of April 27, 1881, states that on the 20th of March last the total charges for transporting grain from Saint Louis to Liverpool via New Orleans, including river rates, ocean rates, insurance and transfer charges at New Orleans, amounted to 46.74 cents per 100 pounds, or 28 cents per bushel, and that at the same time the total charges for transporting grain from Saint Louis to Liverpool via New York, including rail and ocean rates and all incidental charges, amounted to 60.44 cents per 100 pounds, or 36½ cents per bushel. This shows the charges on the route via New Orleans to be less than the rates via Atlantic seaports by 8½ cents per bushel.

At the time this statement was made by Mr. King the river rate was 8½ cents per bushel from Saint Louis to New Orleans. It is, however, believed by well-informed persons that grain can thus be transported in barges at a profit for 4 cents per bushel.

The result of the maintenance for a long period of so wide a difference between the rates by the river route, via New Orleans, and the rail route, via Atlantic seaports, has, of course, been to deflect to the Mississippi River route almost all grain at Saint Louis intended for exportation to foreign countries.

Mr. President, I have here another table which I find in the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, which also clearly shows the advantages of water over railway transportation:

Year.	Rate per ton per mile.			Year.	Rate per ton per mile.
	New York Central Railway.	Erie Railway.	New York State canals.		New York Central Railway.	Erie Railway.	New York State canals.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.		Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1857	3.12	2.45	.799	1869	2.20	1.60	.92
1858	2.59	3.32	.797	1870	1.86	1.37	.83
1859	2.13	2.17	.672	1871	1.65	1.47	1.02
1860	2.06	1.84	.994	1872	1.59	1.52	1.02
1861	1.96	1.73	1.08	1873	1.57	1.45	.88
1862	2.22	1.89	.959	1874	1.47	1.31	.73
1863	2.40	2.09	.876	1875	1.27	1.21	.66
1864	2.75	2.31	1.15	1876	1.05	1.07	.68
1865	3.31	2.76	1.02	1877	1.02	.96	.57
1866	2.92	2.45	1.	1878	.91	.97	.42
1867	2.53	2.04	.9	1879	.80	.78	.46
1868	2.59	1.92	.88	1880	.88	.84	.49

From this table, running through twenty-four years, it appears that transportation upon the Erie Canal has been from 41 to 57 per cent. less than railroad transportation under the most favorable circumstances upon railways running parallel with the canal and under the sharpest competition. But to compare the Columbia River with the Erie Canal gives but a very imperfect idea of what would be the relation of that river as a water-way when made free by removal of the obstructions referred to. Why, sir, ocean steamers of several thousand tons burden ascend the Columbia River for over one hundred miles, and from that point for two hundred and fifty miles further into the interior it is navigable for river steamers of large size and draft. And throughout this whole distance the competing railway will be immediately upon its banks. Every condition would be more favorable upon the Columbia River for cheap rates than upon the Erie Canal, and it cannot be doubted that when the Columbia River shall be made free it will exert an influence upon transportation rates very much more potential in that vast region I have described than that of the Erie canal or the Mississippi even in their respective sections of the country.

But, Mr. President, the influence of the Erie Canal and the Mississippi are by no means local; they extend to far distant and remote lines of transportation. Every through line of railway from the West to New York is affected and its rates modified by the canal or the Mississippi, or by both. And the influence of free navigation upon the Columbia cannot in the nature of things be less extensive in its influence. Its first and direct effect will be upon the line or lines of railway parallel and in close proximity to it, but it will extend to all lines having through connections with these lines, and to all lines operating in competition with them, in the same manner that the rates upon the Erie Canal serve to regulate the rates upon all through railway lines from Chicago east, and from points west of Chicago connected by through lines with Chicago and points east of there.

Mr. President, I have said that if there were no complaints respecting the present tariff of freights upon the transportation lines of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, now holding an absolute control of all transportation facilities for the entire water-shed of the Columbia River east of the Cascade Mountains, wisdom would dictate that these improvements in the Columbia River should be made to the end that no single individual, company, corporation, or combination should hold in their control such vast interests so liable to abuse. But, sir, there is complaint, serious complaint, that exorbitant rates are being exacted of the people for transporting their products to market, that they are thereby oppressed, and the country impeded in its progress and development.

It is not my purpose nor is it necessary for me to join in the hue and cry against this and other corporations on account of real or supposed abuse of their powers or franchises. I desire and my purpose is to deal with facts as they exist, and as far as I am able to contribute by words and votes to such legislation as will effectually place it beyond the power of associated and incorporated wealth to extort from the people more than a fair and reasonable compensation for transportation either in fares or freights. And in this as in all similar cases it is both necessary and proper to inquire what are the rates charged for transportation. So that Congress may be able to act intelligently in the premises. And for this purpose I have before me the advertised and published rates issued by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, on the 25th day of August, 1881, showing the rates charged:

Between Portland and points on lower and upper Columbia and Snake Rivers, the Dalles, Walla Walla, and other points in Oregon, Washington and Idaho Territories.

From this circular I take the rates at two points: The Dalles, distant from Portland 110 miles, and Wallula Junction, distant from Portland 236 miles. The rates of freight to The Dalles is, for first-class freight, 70 cents per 100 pounds; for second-class freight, 60 cents for 100 pounds; for third-class freight, 48 cents per 100 pounds; and for fourth-class freight, 42 cents per 100 pounds. That is, first-class rates is $14 per ton, or 12.72 cents per ton per mile. Second-class is $12 per ton, or 10.9 cents per ton per mile. Third-class is $9.60 per ton, or 8.72 cents per ton per mile, and fourth-class is $8.40 per ton, or 7.62 cents per mile per ton.

Between Portland and Wallula Junction, Washington Territory, 236 miles, for first-class freight, $1.50 per 100 pounds; for second-class freight, $1.35 per 100 pounds; for third-class freight, $1.15 per 100 pounds; and for fourth-class freight, 95 cents per 100 pounds. That is, freight rates between these points by the ton for first-class freight is $30 per ton, or 12.71 cents per ton per mile; second-class is $27 per ton, or 11.44 cents per ton per mile; third-class is $23 per ton, or 9.74 cents per ton per mile; and the fourth-class is $19 per ton, or 7.91 cents per ton per mile. What the average of all classes would be I cannot say, as I have no data bearing upon that point.

Now, Mr. President, I ask Senators to compare these rates with the rates found in a table which I have already referred to, and which will be found at page 184 of the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics upon internal commerce. Why, sir, it will be seen that the fourth-class freight rates are more than twice as great as the rate charged on the New York Central Railway, three times greater than the rates charged on the Erie Railway, and nearly ten times greater than the rates charged on the Erie Canal in 1857 in the very morning of railway transportation, and as compared with the rates on the same lines in 1880 the rates of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company are nine times greater relatively than the rates of the New York Central and Erie Railways, and more than fifteen times greater than the rates on the Erie Canal.

At these rates it is apparent that the principal product of that section, which is wheat, could not be brought to market at all; therefore special rates are made for that and other grains, flour, feed, wool, and hides.

I have here, sir, the special rates for "flour and grain" issued August 20, 1881, by the agent of that company. From The Dalles to Portland, 110 miles, in car-loads of 20,000 pounds, the rate for wheat is 25 cents per 100 pounds; in lots less than 20,000 pounds, 30 cents per 100 pounds; that is to say, the merchant has about 17 per cent. advantage over the average farmer, whose crop may not amount to one car-load; but even he, favored as he is, pays $5 per ton or 4.54 cents per ton per mile, and the farmer must pay $6 per ton or 5.36 cents per ton per mile for transporting wheat from The Dalles to Portland. From Wallula Junction, Washington Territory, to Portland, Oregon, the rates for wheat in car-loads of 20,000 pounds, are 34 cents per 100 pounds, and for less lots 45 cents per 100 pounds, or to the merchant and large farmer $6.80 per ton, or 2.85 cents per ton per mile, and to the average farmer $9, or 3.8 cents per ton per mile.

Now, I ask those Senators who are so much interested in the improvement of the Mississippi to compare these rates with the grain rates on that great river. In May last grain was transported from Saint Louis to New Orleans for five cents a bushel. I believe the distance is about eight hundred miles. On the Columbia the merchant and large farmer must pay fifteen cents, and the small farmer eighteen cents a bushel for transporting wheat one hundred and ten miles. If The Dalles be taken or from Wallula, Washington Territory, the merchant must pay 22.8 cents and the small farmer twenty-six cents, per bushel for a distance of two hundred and thirty-six miles. And if you compare cost per ton per mile with that on the Mississippi, the cost of moving wheat on the Columbia is thirteen and one-half times greater to the farmer than on the Mississippi, and more than ten times greater to the merchant and large farmer. Why, sir, a bushel of wheat can be transported from Saint Louis, via New Orleans, to Liverpool, 5,800 miles, for less money than it costs to transport the same bushel of wheat from Wallula, Washington Territory, to Portland, Oregon, only 236 miles.

It would be improper for me in this connection not to say that the difficulties affecting the cost of transportation on the Upper Columbia are greater than upon the Mississippi and greater than in almost any other part of the United States. Labor is higher, fuel dearer, and stiffer currents must be overcome, and owing to the portages referred to there is more handling. But, sir, these difficulties, great as they are, bear no kind of proportion to the charges for transportation facilities. The plain and unquestioned fact remains after every allowance is made that these rates are simply enormous, and it is not to be wondered at that the people chafe and complain that they are unjust and extortionate.

Mr. President, the estimated cost of the locks at the Cascades when completed is $1,750,000. There have been appropriated $540,000, and the engineer in charge estimates the amount that can be profitably expended next year at $750,000. For several years the amount asked for has been $500,000, and the appropriation has been $100,000. At this rate it will require twelve annual appropriations to complete the work. This policy, Mr. President, is to be condemned from every point of view. It is wasteful and extravagant in that by thus doling out inadequate sums for the proper prosecution of the work large sums must of necessity be expended yearly to protect the unfinished work from loss or destruction. The amount expended brings no return, but is a dead investment until the work is completed. But the worst is that while the Government is thus delaying the execution of an important and necessary public work, the gateway of the Columbia remains in the hands of corporate power, and year after year by this delay this power is enabled to take from the people enough each year to complete the work over and above what they could get if the work was done. Why, Mr. President, it must be apparent that with these obstructions removed ordinary freights to and from all points east of Portland to the head of present navigation could not exceed $10 per ton, and grain would be carried to Portland for an average not exceeding seven or eight cents per bushel. These rates on the surplus of wheat of the last crop would have saved to the people of the Columbia basin some three or four hundred thousand dollars, and upon the other freights the saving would have been very much more than that amount.

Why, sir, the average cost of transporting wheat from the Columbia basin to Portland for the past year (1881) cannot be less than eighteen or twenty cents per bushel, for the larger portion of it is taken from East and North of Wallula, Washington Territory, from which point it cost twenty-two cents per bushel. It cannot be doubted that with proper locks at the Cascades and The Dalles wheat can be taken from Wallula to Portland or Astoria as cheaply as from Saint Louis to New Orleans. The immediate effect of opening the river at these obstructed points would assuredly reduce the average to eight cents per bushel, making a saving of at least ten cents per bushel. This reduction would have saved to the people of that section on the surplus wheat crop of 1881 $375,000. The average cost of other freight up and down the river, exclusive of wheat, other grain, flour and feed, and wool and hides, cannot be less than $25 per ton, and 50,000 tons would be a very low estimate

With these obstructions removed or overcome the cost per ton would sink immediately to or below $10 per ton, which would have been another saving to the people of that section of not less than $750,000 in 1881. That is to say, Mr. President, the freights paid by the people of that section to send their surplus wheat of 1881 to market and for freights on goods and merchandise brought into that section in 1881 was $1,125,000 more than it would have been but for the obstructions referred to, a sum in itself large enough to complete the locks at the Cascades. The cost of improving the river at The Dalles has not been estimated, or at least has not been reported, but it is confidently believed that it will not exceed the cost of the improvement at the Cascades. Both works will certainly not cost to exceed $4,000,000, but the whole cost would be saved to the people within a period of time not greater than that required to construct them, if all the money should be given yearly that could be economically used in the prosecution of the work, for it would take some four or five years to accomplish it.

But, sir, with the pitiful sum of $100,000 annual appropriation the present generation will hardly see both works completed. I assert here that wise statesmanship, economy of expenditure, and a just consideration for the claims of that portion of the people immediately concerned demand, yea, sir, imperatively demand, all the money required to press these improvements to a speedy completion. It will take probably five years under the most favorable conditions to accomplish it, but, sir, in these five years great changes will come. The population in the Columbia basin will be doubled or trebled, the commerce of the Upper Columbia will be three or four times as great as now. Washington Territory, now clamoring for admission, will in all probability be a State in the Union, and Montana and Idaho will be following close in her footsteps.

It will not be argued by any one that this work is not strictly such a work as should be done by the National Government. A very large section of the Northwest is directly concerned in its early completion. The productions of that large area directly to be benefited by its completion go to swell our foreign exports. The exports to foreign countries from the Columbia River for eleven months ending November 30, 1881, was $8,049,418; and the value of the coastwise trade could not have been less than that amount. The vessels clearing coastwise in that time numbered eighty-seven, and had a tonnage of 181,783 tons. The number of vessels clearing for foreign ports in that time was one hundred and three, having a tonnage of 88,764 tons; but beyond all this, within the next two years through freight over two transcontinental railway lines will pass through the pass of the Cascade Mountains made by the Columbia River, and the making of that river free for navigation purposes must of necessity affect in a greater or less degree the rates of freight on these lines. I therefore confidently appeal to the Senators of that great block of States which are interested in these great transcontinental lines, to give their attention and active support to this work, to the end that it may be prosecuted with all the energy and dispatch possible. And I appeal to the Committee on Commerce to give to this work such consideration as a work of so great importance deserves.

But, Mr. President, this is not the only improvement needed upon the Columbia River, and I regret so much is needed, because it is not a pleasant task to press for so many and such large appropriations; but, Mr. President, these appropriations are not only needed in the interest of the population and business interests of Oregon, and of that much larger section drained by the Columbia lying north and east of us, but are still more urgently needed to meet the rapid development now taking place, and which is to continue, and from every indication is to mark one of the phenomenal periods of development in the history of this country. Two transcontinental lines of railway, converging to a common point some three hundred miles in the interior, are to pass down the Columbia to tide-water; another line, connecting Portland and San Francisco, is also soon to be completed, and in addition to all these lines, the Oregon Pacific, now fully under headway, projected from Yaquina Bay on the west line of the State, one hundred and twenty miles south of the Columbia River, is to traverse the State from west to east, connecting with lines from the east in the vicinity of Snake River, on the eastern boundary of the State, shows conclusively that far-seeing men, men of capital, are making great efforts to reach, possess, and control transportation lines and facilities in that section. Railroads are not built where there is no business, or where the conditions do not promise great returns, and these facts very clearly indicate that the commerce of that section, coastwise and foreign, in the immediate future will be very large.

In 1792, I think it was, Vancouver entered the mouth of the Columbia and found twenty-seven feet of water on the bar at extreme low tide. At different periods since then there has been a depth of twenty-six feet of water on the bar, but for the most part since 1848 there has been only twenty-one feet of water at low tide. The history of the Columbia bar shows that it slowly shifts, as Clotsop Spit, on the south, is extended northward with a tendency to resume the conditions and depth of channel when first known, the channel shoaling again as this spit is broken down or recedes. Enough is known to demonstrate the fact that if the forces in operation at the mouth of the river, which for a period of years causes Clotsop Spit to grow and extend, followed by a retrogression, were aided and maintained until it should resume its original condition, there would again be not less than twenty-seven feet of water on the bar, and one straight and broad channel to the sea, instead of two shifting, shallow, tortuous channels, as now.

The time to do this work is when these natural forces are in operation building out Clotsop Spit, and the work should be planned and constructed with a view to assist the spit to assume its former condition and to permanently maintain that condition when reached. This work should be begun at once and pushed to an early completion. The nature and character of the commerce of the Columbia require ships of the largest burden, in order that the ocean freights may be reduced to the lowest possible minimum of cost. And too much stress cannot be placed upon the importance of securing at the mouth of that river the greatest possible depth of water to be supplemented with such improvements between the mouth and Portland as will enable sea-going vessels at all times to reach that city with ease and dispatch. In fact, Mr. President, the improvement of the Columbia River by removal or the overcoming of the obstructions at the Cascades and The Dalles, by securing "greater depth of water over the bar at its mouth," and a better ship channel from the mouth to Portland, is a system, as it were, composed of these different parts, each and all pressingly urgent.

Mr. President, there is another improvement in Oregon not connected with the Columbia River which I feel constrained to mention in this connection, from the fact that in connection with it are projected lines of railway which are of such importance to the people of Middle Oregon and will, when completed, have so great an effect upon the cost of transportation that I must not omit to call attention to it now. One of the strongest, if not the strongest, argument in favor of the opening of the Upper Columbia River to free navigation is the effect such improvement will have in cheapening freights. The effective improvement of Yaquina Bay and the completion of the Oregon-Pacific Railway, now under construction, from that bay to the eastern line of the State must of necessity have a very decided influence in reducing freight charges in all Western Oregon, and to a very large degree in a large portion of Eastern Oregon.

Two years ago $40,000 was appropriated for the improvement of the Yaquina Bay, and last year $10,000 more was appropriated. This money has been expended, and now the people along the line of the road are feeling so much solicitude for the safety of the work done and for its future prosecution that large sums have been and are being contributed by them and expended, under permission of the War Department, in preserving the works already put in and in getting out material to be used the coming year in case an appropriation can be had.

This work, Mr. President, commends itself to Congress most strongly from the fact that it opens an entirely new line of communication from the Willamette Valley to the ocean. Congress can afford and ought to be liberal in its appropriation for the improvement of the Yaquina Bay from the fact that duties upon steel rails now on the way for the Oregon Pacific road will exceed $200,000, the amount asked by the memorial of the Legislature of the State for immediate use.

Mr. President, I trust the Committee on Commerce of the Senate will not fail to give patient and favorable consideration to the claims of the Columbia River and Yaquina Bay for liberal appropriations; and failing in that, I trust this Senate will, when the time comes, sustain proper amendments to the river and harbor bill in that behalf.

I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

TARIFF AND TAX COMMISSION.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, according to previous notice, I ask the kindness of the Senate to permit me to call up the bill of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] on the tariff commission for the purpose of submitting a few remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill (S. No. 22) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the question of the tariff and internal-revenue laws will be considered before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, the tendencies of all democratic societies are first toward the absorption by the majority of the benefits and emoluments of the government at the expense of the minority; and secondly toward the concentration of exclusive privileges in the hands of the few. The Government of the United States is traveling that road with both certainty and rapidity. A difference of domestic institutions, modes of life, and industrial productions has separated the country into two sections. I live in the minority section, and apropos to the pending bill of the Senator from Vermont, I propose to show to the Senate some of the inequalities of our national legislation which have inured to the benefit of the majority section. I think I shall be able to demonstrate by facts and figures that the superiority of the one section to the other in wealth, education, and material progress is due in great measure to this unequal and unjust legislation.

In the first place, there was and is the public domain. Perhaps no people on earth ever possessed such a rich and happily situated expanse of virgin lands. They were the common property of the people of the United States, and were in great part the free gift of some of the original States of this Union, notably of Virginia and North Carolina, who generously contributed this great wealth to aid the Government in paying the price of our independence. That portion not so contributed was acquired by the common blood and treasure; and chiefly through the statesmanship of the South. It would seem, therefore, that this "common property" should have been used for the common benefit; either it should have been sold and the proceeds placed in the Treasury, or it should have been divided equally among the States, or it should have been granted to actual settlers from all the States without distinction. Neither was done. How they have been disposed of is matter of history. I propose to show that the North obtained the lion's share.

In Mr. Spofford's American Almanac the statistics are compiled showing how the public domain has been disposed of, and I propose to refer briefly to that compilation. For the construction of railroads the Northern States have received directly from the Government 32,488,806 acres; while for similar purposes the South has received 12,365,351 acres. Railroad corporations in the North have received for building railroads 139,341,000 acres; while a single Southern corporation, if indeed the Southern Pacific Railroad can be so called, has received 9,520,000. For constructing canals, the Northern States have received 4,405,986 acres, while the Southern States have received not one acre.

For educational purposes the partiality is still worse, and the inequality is still more glaring, and should put to shame every man who is disposed to boast that the people of the North are so much better educated than those of the South. For the establishment and support of schools, the Northern States have received from the Government 70,213,534 acres of the public lands, while the States of the South have received but 6,434,446 acres, more than eleven acres to one of this "common property." And yet the recipients of this bounty taunt those who got it not with illiteracy. Is it any wonder that the South is behind, is it strange that the man who has eleven acres given him to educate his children should do it better than he who has but one? How small and ungenerous it is in him who is permitted to ride free, as a Government dead-head, to boast of getting ahead of his neighbor who bears his burden afoot.

Nor has it been any better in the distribution of money directly from the public Treasury. The same shameful partiality has been observed from the foundation of the Government to the present day. For purposes of public buildings, light-houses, armories and arsenals, navy-yards, and marine hospitals, fortifications, &c., there have been expended in the Northern States $136,774,518, while in the borders of the Southern States there have been expended by the Government for similar purposes $72,554,906, though an equal, if not a greater, extent of sea-coast to be defended is in the latter section.

For purposes of rivers and harbors, canals, roads, railroads, and other internal improvements within the Northern States the Government has expended $59,661,010, while in the Southern States for similar purposes it has expended $22,259,473. Of bonds of the Government to aid in building northern railroads there have been issued $78,926,732, while none have been issued in aid of any railroad running through the Southern States. This makes a grand total of money and bonds expended by the Government for the development and protection of the Northern States of $275,362,260, against $94,814,379, expended in the Southern States, and a grand total of the public lands of 246,449,326 acres expended for the benefit of the Northern States, and 28,319,797 acres expended for the benefit of the Southern States. This does not take into account at all the fishing bounties and other drawbacks on taxation of which the North received the exclusive benefit. When to all this is added the fact that more than seven-tenths of the emoluments of public office have for twenty years past been enjoyed by the northern people; that fifty millions in pensions are annually paid there, together with almost the whole of the interest of the public debt, there can be little wonder that the northern section of the Union keeps ahead of the southern. Is it to be wondered at that we who feel these inequalities so keenly become a little restive under the gibes upon our ignorance and want of thrift, so called; that we refuse to fold our hands and submit to it all with the meekness of an Egyptian fellah? Are we to blame, do you think, for endeavoring to let the world know the truth that one section of the Union, having the physical power to do so, absorbs the public property of both, and seizes to itself with rapacious greed all the emoluments and riches of the Republic?

But it may be said with regard to the public money—it cannot be said of the public domain—that as the North pays most of it into the Treasury it is but right that it should receive most. This is only an apparent, not a real, state of facts. It would be a poor compliment to the statesmanship of the North to say, while it was successful in absorbing the public property by the direct and brutal force of numbers, it was incapable of that ingenious legislation which insidiously bleeds to death one class or section for the benefit of another. No better scheme for this purpose, nor one more plausible and absolutely false in its pretenses, was ever devised than the existing tariff on foreign imports, the burdens of which fall most heavily on the agricultural people of the South. Of all the unjust and unequal legislation ever enacted by Congress this is the most unjust and unequal; of all the causes which have operated to prevent the material progress of the South and to keep the people poor, this tariff for protection, so called, is, and has been, most potent. I think the following propositions are correct and can be maintained:

1. Money levied upon the people for the support of the Government is taxation.

2. Money levied upon the people for the support of Government in proportion to the ability of each citizen to pay, is just taxation.

3. Money levied on each citizen for the support of Government in proportion to his ability to pay, in such manner as to put most money into the Treasury and with least direct and indirect waste, is both just and wise taxation.

4. Money levied on the people, not for the support of Government, but for the benefit of a particular class of men at the expense of another is not taxation, but robbery.

These are the propositions that I propose to maintain in the few remarks which I shall submit to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. VANCE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the Senator was a member of the House of Representatives at the time of the passage of the tariff bill which passed the House in 1860 and passed the Senate in 1861. I desire to ask him whether he did not vote to sustain the bill as it passed the House at that time?

Mr. VANCE. I really cannot say now whether I did or not. It is possible that I voted for that bill, but I do not think I did. If the Senator will cite my record, I will make the acknowledgment; but I do not think I did.

I want to say, sir, that in my opinion prohibitory protection, as it is called, is the legislation of Dick Turpin and of Sixteen String Jack, levied in the Halls of Congress instead of upon Black Heath Common. There is more of civilization in the one than in the other, but there is less of manhood. The one sneakingly evades the Ten Commandments, and the other openly defies them and takes the consequences.

Now, sir, our fathers provided in the Constitution, under which we live and which we are supposed to obey, that there should be absolute equality and free trade between all the States of this Union; and in my opinion they did not provide for any restriction on the trade between these States and foreign nations except such as may be necessary to raise revenue to support the Government, to provide for the common defense, and promote the general welfare. To this extent is the decision which has been more than once quoted here of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Loan Association vs. The City of Topeka, 20 Wallace. When any Senator on the other side complains, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was disposed to do the other day, that we use hard terms when we style protective legislation "robbery," I want him to understand that the term is not mine but it is the term used by the Supreme Court of the United States. Here is what they say, among other things:

> Beyond a cavil there can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose. * * * To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen and with the other bestow it upon favored individuals, to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less robbery because it is done under the forms of the law and is called taxation.

Let these gentlemen quarrel with the Supreme Court. Again:

> It must be conceded that there are rights in every free government beyond the control of the State. A government which recognized no such rights, which held the lives, the liberty, and the property of its citizens subject at all times to the absolute disposition and unbounded control of even the most democratic depository of power, is after all but a despotism.

The gist of the decision in this important case, which is too long to quote, is that necessarily and inherently the power of taxation in every government which is free is limited to those purposes which are public in their nature, and can be made to extend to no others. If the property of the citizen could be taken for the use of private persons and to promote private fortunes, why not his constitutional rights, his liberties, or his life; and if a State of this Union, which has all the powers of sovereignty minus only those which she has granted by the Constitution to the Federal Government, cannot, as the court says, levy such a tax in aid of private fortunes and to build up the enterprises of individuals, how can the Government of the United States, which has only limited and defined powers? In other words, how can the Government of the United States through the Constitution derive a power from the States which the court says the States had not to give? So this tax levied upon the property of a citizen to bestow upon favored individuals "to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes," to use the language of the court, is an unconstitutional tax.

Now, let us see what the present law was framed for, and what purpose it was intended to subserve. In addition to what was said by its advocates at the time of its passage, and to what is now said in opposing its repeal or modification, I desire to refer to the authoritative declaration of the national tariff convention recently assembled in the city of New York. I presume that will be regarded as good authority. Among other things the following resolutions were adopted by that body:

> Resolved by the national tariff convention now assembled in New York City, That the chief aim and purpose of a tariff on all foreign-made fabrics and all raw materials not produced or existing in this country is for the protection of American labor and to enable our manufacturers through a tariff to pay higher wages to American workingmen than they would be able to do were they forced to compete with unprotected foreign workingmen where labor is pauperized, and where laborers have not the civil, religious, or political rights that our workingmen enjoy.
> Resolved, That the protection of our labor in preference to the labor of any other country is the cardinal point of every sound protectionist, and is now, as it was in 1879, the first and chief duty of our Government.

This is a compendium of the whole question. In these few words are contained every specious pretext, every false pretense, every hypocritical howl, every communistic yelp ever uttered in behalf of the doctrine that the Government is bound to support a man who cannot support himself in the favorite occupation which he has chosen.

The Senator from Maine, without any disguise, came out the other day and avowed that he was for protection for protection's sake; that if there was not a single dollar of public debt, if there was not a single dollar of public revenue to be raised, nevertheless he was for protection.

Now, to begin with, the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest tribunal in this land, has denounced that doctrine as robbery. There is not one single, solitary word concerning revenue in those resolutions, and to the best of my recollection there was not one word concerning revenue in the speech of the Senator from Maine. It was all protection, protection, protection.

Mr. President, when the Supreme Court denounced that as robbery, as a lawyer and a law-abiding man I agreed with the Supreme Court. Common sense agrees with the Supreme Court; common honesty agrees with the Supreme Court. "It is none the less robbery because it is done under the forms of law and called taxation."

Now, Mr. President, having, as I trust, shown, at least to my own satisfaction, that this kind of taxation is unconstitutional, let us examine briefly into its claims for patriotism and beneficence, of which it so loudly boasts. In the first place, they say that protection increases the wages of labor and prevents our free workingmen from being compelled to compete with the pauper labor of the world; second, that it builds up a home market, keeps our money at home, and in this respect increases the national wealth; third, that the prosperity of the manufacturer is the prosperity of the people generally, and especially of consumers; and fourth, that it cheapens production.

I am aware that I cannot say anything that is very new on the subject of the tariff, and that all the arguments and incidents upon which I shall rely to refute these allegations have been said again and again, and that they are so numerous that it is almost impossible to arrange them in anything like compact form. They crowd upon the mind.

With reference to the first claim, there can be no doubt of the fact that it does enable them to pay higher wages; but as to whether they do pay higher wages or not is a very different question. The census of 1860, under an average tariff duty of 19 per cent., showed that the ratio of the cost of labor to the total cost of production was 20 per cent. In 1870, under an average tariff duty of over 43 per cent., labor was only 18½ per cent. As to 1880 I have not been able to obtain the statistics of the totality of our manufactures, but I find from a tabulated statement made by the Senator from Vermont as to woolens and cottons for that year, labor in cotton is only about 22 or 23 per cent. of the cost of production against 16¾ in 1860, and in wool not so much; while in iron it is to-day less than 19 per cent., under an average tariff, I suppose, on iron articles of about 75 per cent. There is no getting around or evading these stern figures.

By the tariff of 1861 duties on imports were more than doubled, and yet absolutely the ratio of the cost of wages to the total cost of production was 1½ per cent. less than under the tariff of 1846; and since that the slight increase that has been made does not near keep pace with the increase in the tariff. Who has received the increased price paid for manufactures under the high tariff since 1861? According to the census, that increase did not go into the pockets of the laborers. Where did it go? I think I can tell where it went. I think it went into the plethoric pockets of the manufacturers themselves, and with it they have set up newspapers to advocate the cause of "American labor;" with it they swarm this building with lobbyists in behalf of "American labor;" with it they have built those lordly mansions surrounded by landscape gardens and all objects of taste and beauty which make the comfortless surroundings and the plain homes of the unprotected look so picturesquely shabby in the far-off contrast. That is where I think this increased taxation has gone.

Even if the manufacturer did divide with his laborer, as he was enabled to do by the tariff, it must be remembered that the laborer himself is a consumer, and that while his wages were raised by the tariff every item that he consumes was also raised by the tariff to the extent of the average duty; so that the laborer who lived within a protected factory would be left by the tariff just where he was found—his increased wages consumed by the increase in price of all the necessaries of life. But to unprotected laborers, fully five to one, it was pure taxation, unaccompanied by any compensation whatever.

And this brings me to the consideration of the question, who is an American laborer that requires protection? According to the idea of the protectionists no man is a laborer and an American unless he stands at a New England spindle, or in a Pennsylvania iron-forge, or at some cotton or woolen loom; these are American laborers, and no one else, and those only are entitled to the protection and the fostering care of their Government. The masons, carpenters, joiners, railroad-hands, canal-diggers, miners, fellers of the forests, toilers in the cotton-fields of the South and in the corn and wheat lands of the West, teamsters, herders, millers, shoemakers, tinners, tanners, ditchers, smiths, hod-carriers, personal servants, school-masters, printers, painters, plasterers, wheelwrights, carters, and draymen, these and all other workers, too numerous to mention, who fill our land with prosperity and furnish seven-eighths of our trade with the world—these, all, so far from receiving any protection, are taxed heavily as inferior beings on everything they eat, drink, and wear, to support the "American laborer" and to prevent his being undersold by a foreign pauper. So in fact and in truth, if protection was honestly divided between capital and labor, it would only "protect" a very small portion of "American labor," and that protection would be at the expense of the great remainder. It is therefore a false claim.

To show the utter hypocrisy of this cry of the capitalists, let us refer to the manner in which they supply their demand for labor. They do not select from the small protected class of their own countrymen, but they select from the whole labor-class of America and the world; and they pay no more than the market price fixed by this universal competition. There is no restriction, tariff, or duty whatever upon the labor market where they seek their supplies. "Workingmen," says the Senator from Vermont, "including every shipload of emigrants, have found acceptable employment." Why, Mr. President, is not every man who works by the sweat of his brow a laborer? Have not these men who are excluded from the category of American given us all our wealth and all our prosperity, felled our forests and builded our railroads and dug our canals and made the land to "blossom as the rose?"

The Senator from Maine the other day astonished me, not so much by what he said and by what he saw, but by what he did not see and did not speak. And he did not have the excuse for not seeing these facts that Captain Cuttle rendered to Mr. Toots when Mr. Toots came and asked him if he could see Sol Gills. "No, sir," said Captain Cuttle, "you cannot see Sol Gills." "Why or wherefore?" "Bekase he is inwisible." [Laughter.] These facts were not invisible to the Senator. He said it is our duty to protect American labor, and showed the difference between the labor of America and the labor of Europe. The European laborers are politically inferior beings, not invested with any of the privileges and franchises of the country in which they live, but here, according to the Constitution, said the Senator, the laborers are the governors, they are the Government. So it is, Mr. President; I agree with him.

But if he can show me under the Constitution that the fellow who stands at the New England spindle is any more the Government than the field laborers in the South and West, I will agree to give up the question. When he asserts that it is necessary that the spinner or forge hand should receive wages that will enable him to qualify himself for his duties as a citizen in this greatest of all republics, and in a country more than any other upon earth demanding intelligence in those who support it and govern it, I agree to every word he says. But if he can show me why the man who hoes cotton in the South at $10 a month should be taxed 35 per cent. on his shoe-leather, and 75 per cent. upon his jack-knife, and 100 per cent. upon his flannel shirt, and almost as much upon everything else that he uses, in order that the wages of his brother laborer in New England should be such as shall enable him to do all this, then I will take my departure from this subject and agree to hold my peace. When he can show me the law or equity or policy for making one laborer feed another and educate him and his children, then is the controversy closed.

American labor! Certainly, sir, I am with you for American labor; let us protect American labor and put the laborer as high in the scale of intelligence as possible; but do not require the poor negro, making cotton in the South at $10 a month, to pay at least one-half of that ten to the New England man that he may have carpets on the floor and a piano in the parlor, that his children may go to school and all may learn to read and write. That is not the kind of protection I want. That brings the whole subject to the condition I indicated in my opening remarks. That is class legislation; that is unjust legislation; that is unequal legislation; that is unconstitutional legislation; that is dishonest legislation, and that is all there is of it. I want all American labor to have a fair and even chance. I want my own poor workingmen at home protected, not only against foreign paupers but also against domestic brigandage. Almost every item of foreign raw material used by our factories is the product of foreign "pauper labor," and is admitted duty free. By the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics for the three months ending September 30, 1880, there is seen a statement of the imports of iron-ore which shows a total of 425,000 tons, worth $1,192,000, brought from every quarter of the world, all dug by pauper labor, and much of it even by convict labor, as I am informed, notably 113,000 tons from the French possessions in Africa. This in preference to the ore dug by free American labor in Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, North Carolina, and other States. It comes in as ballast in foreign bottoms, to the detriment of American ship-owners. In fact Joe Smith's Book of Mormon imports absolute verity by the side of this cry of the protected capitalists of the North for the protection of American against pauper labor.

The foreign pauper is in fact the special favorite of the manufacturers, who discriminate in his behalf whenever they can possibly make anything by it. In the first place, they invite him here and give him a homestead on the public domain if he will settle upon it, while they deny this to eleven millions of their own countrymen who cannot take the iron-clad oath, citizens of the States through whose instrumentality chiefly that domain was acquired. In the next place, we see by the reports of the consuls that there is a considerable and constantly increasing trade with nearly all the countries of the world in American manufactures; the meaning of which is that they are selling their goods to "foreign paupers" in competition with British manufactures at about one-half the price they sell the same goods to their own countrymen at home. American labor is taxed that foreign paupers may have our goods cheap. The most distant and the most savage peoples enjoy this privilege over us. The cannibal who dines on Sydney Smith's missionary, knocks him in the head with a hatchet for which he paid nothing but the cost of production, cuts him up with a free jack-knife, for which our own people would have paid 65 per cent., and salts him (if he uses the condiments) with the salt for the production of which we have paid 56 per cent. If the missionary disagrees with him, he has free drugs for his medication, on which we pay a duty of from 25 to 100 per cent. As for the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands, we have a treaty of absolute free trade with them; and those deserving people are furnished at half price with all they need of goods, the manufacture of which is paid for by the taxation of the American people. They are all paupers according to the protectionist idea, but little removed from barbarism, and yet for the sake of helping our manufactures to a market we let in their sugar free, to break down the sugar interests of Louisiana, which is the product of American labor. In the face of these facts the cry of protection to American labor becomes the merest sham, the veriest cant that ever was employed as the slogan even of a party faction for the deception of mankind. The men who employ it take advantage of the laws of political economy by purchasing everything they use, even to their labor, in the unrestricted markets of the world, and violate those laws openly by forcing their own countrymen to buy from them only, and shutting off by an act of Congress all possible competition. Already they use cheap Canadian labor, and to-morrow they would fill their factories with Coolies and pig-tailed Chinese to the exclusion of American labor if they were not fearful their establishments would be burned over their heads. Away with this miserable pretext.

As to the next claim for protection, that it builds up a home market, keeps our money from going abroad, and in this respect increases the national wealth, there is this to be observed: in the first place, it does not build up a home market, except for the manufacturer; in the second place, it does not increase the public wealth in keeping our money at home and forcing us to pay double prices for all we need. The census up to 1870 shows that the agricultural interests immediately adjacent to the factories have increased in the same proportion with the factories themselves, so that no additional demand for the products of agriculture from other sections of the country has been created by the growth of the other interest. No market was yet found for the teeming riches of our soil South, West, Northwest, Southwest, at home. If sold at all, they could not be purchased and consumed by the three or four millions of the protected class; they had to reach out and find a market in the hungry world, particularly among the despised paupers of Europe. It was many, many years before transportation from the distant interior to the seaports was established on cheap and easy terms; and when their products did at last reach the coast, they found no American ships to take them abroad as they did in the days of a revenue tariff, and foreign ships could not bring in anything to exchange for them by reason of "protection." The consequence of this obstructed and unnatural state of trade was, that the manufacturer had, indeed, a "home market" at his own price, both to sell and buy in. Foreign products were absolutely shut off from competition with him, and this in turn shut off foreign competition for our agricultural products. Truly, it is a lovely home market for the manufacturer; sure enough it keeps our money at home; that is to say, in the manufacturers' pockets, not in the pockets of the people or in the Treasury of the people. The Senator from Vermont, who so lately entertained us with an elaborate and ingenious speech, seems more in love with a home market than any one I have ever met. The drift of his argument, toward its conclusion, was that we were raising entirely too much cotton, too much wheat and corn, and provisions generally.

"The South," he says, "should curtail its cotton crop, and turn unfruitful capital and labor into other and more profitable channels of industry. The untrodden fields where capital and labor wait to be organized for the development of southern manufactures and mining offer unrivaled temptations to leaders among men in search of legitimate wealth." Of the farmers of the West, he says:

> Every ship-load of wheat sent abroad tends to bring down foreign prices, and such far-off markets should be sought only when the surplus at home is excessive, or when foreign prices are extraordinarily remunerative. * * * Certainly we need not be in haste to slaughter and utterly exhaust the native fertility of our fields on the cheap terms now presented.

The meaning of all this plainly is, for the farmers of the South to raise no more cotton than will supply the home market—that is, the New England factories—and for the farmers of the West to grow no more provisions than would feed the operatives in those factories, and let the great benefits of a foreign market, export and import, slip from our hands. What a delightful prospect for a protected manufacturer! The raw material and the necessaries of life at his own price, and his wares protected against the competition of all the world by a tariff of over 50 per cent.! Mr. President, if the task were imposed on me of depicting a Yankee heaven, I should say that this description ended my labors. The utter absurdity of such a policy, viewed in the light of the true principles of political economy, is only equaled by its shameless selfishness. Surely, Mr. President, I need not invoke the great names of that science of sciences, of Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill, Fawcett, Wells, and the long list which embraces the brightest of mankind, to prove that a nation cannot get rich by trading with itself—by a policy of absolute exclusion. As well might we say that the supply of water in a house could be increased by distributing it around in different vessels. There is a legend I have heard which the rabbis inform me is not to be found in the Talmud which says that the three Hebrew children, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, while in the fiery furnace and excluded from the competition of foreign paupers, swapped jack-knives among themselves until each one had made a dollar and a half and got the best knife. I commend this illustrious instance of the benefits of a home market to the prayerful consideration of the Senator from Vermont. [Laughter.]

Surely the Senator from Vermont can remember the time when there was what is called in the history of this country the Japan expedition. What was that? Japan was a nation of people out on the extreme edge of Asia—I do not know whether it would be east or west from us; it is owing to which way you travel I suppose whether it would be east or west—but they were a people who had forestalled the policy of the Senator from Vermont and believed in a home market, and believed in chopping off all competition with foreigners. Their ports were closed; no trade and no intercourse was allowed with the world. They were a world and a law unto themselves, and they had a right to be. It was none of our business if they did not see proper to trade with us or with the rest of the world. They certainly had a right to sit down and enjoy the blessings of a home market. But the people of this country thought otherwise. They fitted out the Japan expedition and sent ships of war and planted the Stars and Stripes in the face of these barbarians, and they displayed from the port-holes of American ships those tremendous cannon whose roar has been the fear as well as the admiration of mankind on all the seas of the earth. Japan, by force of duress, opened her ports and reversed the policy of the Senator from Vermont and consented to trade and let goods come in from foreign ports. I have some recollection of that, and I commend it to the Senator from Vermont.

The American Iron and Steel Association, in a recent address to Congress, in speaking of the great benefits showered upon the country by the protective tariff, states among other things, "that it compelled Europe also to send us within the past few months over $65,000,000 in gold." And this they say preserved the balance of trade in our favor and was a great cause of our prosperity; and this they say was the result of the tariff, although the balance was entirely due to unprotected agricultural products! Without desiring to do injustice to gentlemen whom I do not know, I must say, that whether this assumption that our wealth was thus increased because $65,000,000 in gold had to be sent here to pay for agricultural products, instead of sending goods to be exchanged therefor, was made through ignorance or with a design to mislead, long held me in doubt. It seems to me that a tyro must know that the articles represented by $65,000,000 would constitute more wealth than the money itself, but for the operation of the tariff. These gentlemen represent the iron interest, which is protected by a tariff varying from 35 to 160 per cent.; railroad rails more than 100 per cent. Now, suppose that sixty-five millions had been expended in Europe for steel rails, it would have purchased nearly 2,000,000 tons, which, brought into this country, would have added that much to the public wealth. But coming in as it did in gold, it would purchase but 1,000,000 tons from this American Iron and Steel Association. So the country is poorer by at least 1,000,000 tons of steel rails, but the gentlemen of this association are richer by $32,500,000, and the Treasury has received not one cent—and they call this national prosperity! Shades of political economy, where art thou!

In the same line is the reasoning of the Senator from Vermont. In telling us how protection has increased the national wealth, he instances steel. He says:

> No more of all sorts than 11,838 tons was made in 1860, but 1,397,015 tons were made in 1880.

The average price of steel rails for that year—and I presume steel bars and ingots were not less—was $67.50 per ton. Its consumption therefore, at wholesale rates, cost the people $94,298,512. In England, minus the tariff, it could have been bought for about one-half that sum, say $47,000,000, or the same sum would have put twice as much steel here for the use of the people. And that is getting rich! Does not the Senator mistake things when he uses the term "national" prosperity? Did he not mean to say the prosperity of the Bessemer steel monopoly? Suppose Congress had appropriated the money directly from the Treasury to buy that steel and given it to the people, would that have increased the public wealth? Can a nation just buy itself rich by taxation to make the purchases? If so, what is to hinder us from becoming the richest people in the world, on the principle that the more we buy and the higher the price we pay the better? And what is the difference between the direct and the indirect methods of buying this steel, so far as it bears on the question of the public wealth?

If this idea of excluding all foreign trade should prevail and the South and West were to accept the policy of the Senator and grow no bread or cotton except for the home market, it would be interesting to inquire what would become of us? And if we went to manufacturing, as we are advised, what would become of New England? And after we had supplied the home market where could we sell anything else? How could we then pay high wages and compete with pauper labor if we cannot do it now? And if we sent out no agricultural products or manufactures, would we not have to send abroad gold for all we got? Such advice of course is not in good faith; it is only a feeble effort to reconcile the people of the agricultural regions to a protective tariff. What would become of our foreign trade if such an idea was carried out, and where would go that balance of trade created for us by our agricultural products alone? Yet this wholesale national ruin is gravely advised by the disciples of protection. One orator in that tariff convention went so far as to exclaim:

> We do not want a market in Liverpool or in Manchester; but we want our food to be consumed by Americans, under our own flag.

Which sentiment was received with great applause and laughter. He certainly was in favor of a home market if he did not have common sense.

Depicting the calamities that befell the commercial world in 1873, the Senator from Vermont wisely fails to tell us how such a thing happened under a protective tariff. He only says, dogmatically, that it would have been much worse if we had been living under free trade; and adds that "American workingmen found some shelter in their home market." I beg again to correct a certain looseness of expression peculiar to all high tariff men, and into which the Senator has unadvisedly fallen. Of course, he did not mean to leave the impression which his words convey, that all "American workingmen" found that shelter from the storm, but only that small fraction of them who work in protected factories—those who are within the pale. Those without that privileged circle, as the Senator well knows, had no shelter whatever, but were stripped to the bone to furnish shelter for those who, in imitation of the three tailors of Tooley street, style themselves "the American workingmen."

Admitting, as in common honesty they are bound to do, the abstract injustice of taxing the many for the benefit of the few, the protectionists confess and avoid by saying that protection really helps all classes by furnishing a home market to all, and enabling the manufacturer to pay higher prices to the agriculturist. Now, if the three million people engaged in manufacturing could consume all the surplus raised on our bounteous soil, in our magnificent climate, by the other forty-seven millions of the American people, there would be some sense in this proposition. But we know they cannot, and the attempt to subordinate the interests of the great mass of the people to the convenience and profit of a fraction, by shutting them off from the markets of the world, is simply an outrage. It has neither political economy, nor justice, nor constitutional law to justify it. That it helps a man to tax him for the pocket of another man is a New England proposition that needs "protection" also, badly.

Take, for instance, the cotton-planter in the South. That great industry—I fear to call it an "American industry"—furnished last year $211,535,905 toward the aggregate of our foreign trade, almost ten times the amount furnished by iron and steel, and more than all the manufactured products combined. Yet the iron and steel manufacturers get their raw material mostly and their labor all free, and their products are protected by a duty ranging from 35 to 180 per cent. How is it with the cotton-grower? In the first place he pays all the taxes, State and national, that all other citizens are required to pay. When he starts out in the spring to pitch his crop, on his plow he pays 50 per cent. ad valorem; his trace-chains to pull the plow, 2½ cents per pound; on his wagon, harrow, and other irons, 50 per cent.; on his jack-knife, 50 per cent.; on the square by which he measures his work, 6 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem; on his files and rasps, 10 cents per pound and 30 per cent.; on his saw, 8½ cents and 30 per cent.; for his ax, 40 per cent.; for the iron hoops which inclose his bale of cotton when made, 1½ cents per pound; for his hammer, 2½ cents per pound; his wrought nails, 2½ cents per pound; his cut nails, 1½ cents per pound; his horse-shoe nails, 5 cents per pound; his tacks and sprigs, 2½ cents per thousand; for wood screws, from 8 to 11 cents per pound; for cast iron hinges for his door, 2½ cents per pound; on his wife's sad-iron, 1½ cents per pound; on his cross-cut saw, 10 cents per foot. All this, averaging nearly 100 per cent., he pays to the Pennsylvania iron and steel manufacturers, not to the Government. On the bagging for his cotton-bales, he pays 2 cents per yard; on his cotton shirt, 5 cents per yard and 10 per cent.; on his wife's calico dress, 5½ cents per yard and 20 per cent.; on her spool thread, ¼ cent each and 30 per cent.; on the common stone-ware of his table, 25 per cent.; on his school-boy's slate-pencil, 40 per cent.; on his glass tumblers, 40 per cent.; on his sugar and molasses, 49 per cent.; on his coarse blankets, about 95 per cent.; on his wool hat and flannel shirt, about the same; on his wife's shawl, 50 cents per pound and 35 per cent., (over 100 per cent.;) on his borax, 10 cents per pound; his clock, 35 per cent.; his wife's camphor, 5 cents per pound; her gloves, 50 per cent.; hair pins, 50 per cent.; on his glue, 20 per cent.; his grindstone, 1 cent per pound; powder, 6 cents per pound and 20 per cent.; suspenders, 35 per cent.; rubber boots for bad weather, 30 per cent.; his leather, 25 per cent.; his kerosine oil, 40 cents per gallon. In sickness his morphia is taxed $1 per ounce; castor-oil, $1 per gallon, and his opium $1 per pound. Even on his fruit trees and his garden and agricultural seeds he is taxed 20 per cent. ad valorem. Nearly all of this goes into the pockets of the manufacturers, who claim that the planter's prosperity is increased by this searching taxation! Nothing is free to him. Nothing escapes this all-pervading, inevitable, protective tariff—certain as death, hungry as the grave, unsatisfiable as the sea. From the time he sees the light until that light is quenched in the eternal darkness that southern planter knows no untaxed hour or untaxed thing. He is enveloped in taxation, soaked, steeped, and saturated in it; and yet his product alone exceeds by far in value the combined products of all the protected manufactories of the United States in the list of foreign exports, which are the chief source of our national wealth. And yet this poor, deluded man, the cotton-planter, is infinitely benefited by this enormous taxation, if he only knew it! In some mysterious way, known only to the esoteric disciples of protection, the more money he pays to the manufacturer for the necessities of his occupation the richer he becomes! What a blessed thing is protective taxation, that thus gives and receives wealth! The protected man undoubtedly gets rich, as his palaces and summer seats testify. The planter undoubtedly gets rich, says the Senator, notwithstanding his comfortless home and hard-run surroundings tell a different tale.

Now, if taxation of the planter for the pocket of the manufacturer really helps the planter, why would it not help the manufacturer to be taxed for the planter's benefit? Suppose we swap positions a little while, just to learn how it feels. Suppose we put a tax of $5 per bale on every bale of cotton used by an American factory, for the encouragement of cotton planting? It would certainly help the planter, enable him to pay higher wages to the "American labor" which works his fields, and thereby enable him to compete with the pauper labor of Asia, Africa, and South America; and it would enable the manufacturer to get higher prices for all he has to sell. That is the protective sauce for the goose; why will it not serve for the gander? It would not, as some might suppose, increase the price of cotton goods; for a tariff cheapens goods when placed on the manufactured articles, and of course it would on the raw material also. This is the protective doctrine, at least, which converts taxation into a blessing and a means of wealth. Let us be truthful. The whole production of the Bessemer steel monopoly in 1880 was 954,460 tons, which they were enabled by the tariff to sell for $64,726,056. The increased price over British rails which the tariff enabled them to charge, and which may be set down as nearly clear profit, was $31,155,320. According to an estimate of Mr. Spofford, in the American Almanac, the net profits realized on the cotton crop of 1875, the chief staple of eleven States and at least 12,000,000 of people, was only $12,000,000. Contrast this with the profits of one single monopoly, of iron and steel, and then undertake to make the cotton planters believe that they too are prospering through the prosperity of that protected monopoly! And yet if these cotton planters had been compelled to rely on this much vaunted home market, and had not been able to reach out to the markets of Europe, that twelve millions of profit, small as it is, would have disappeared in a loss of at least twelve millions. And the same may be said of tobacco, of wheat, and all other agricultural products. So much for a home market.

It is claimed, also, that protection in the shape of a high tariff cheapens production, and that under it we get goods at a lower rate than we would under free trade.

The Senator from Maine maintained this in his argument recently, and demonstrated it, as he no doubt thought, by showing the gradual reduction in the price of various articles. Never was there a more fallacious reasoning. He gives to the tariff the credit for things due entirely to the progress of the arts, of civilization, and the increase of our species. As well might he claim that the cheap and rapid transportation of steam as compared with horse-power was due to protection, and not to the steam-engine; that protection caused cheap garments, and not the sewing-machine; or had brought about cheap grain harvesting, and not the reaper; or cheap printing, and not the power-press. He might as well have claimed that because twenty years ago when I was in Congress it cost me fifty cents to ride in a carriage from the Hall of the House of Representatives to my lodgings and I can go for five cents on a horse-car now, that is due to protection. He underestimates altogether the fact that competition, even limited and proscribed as a protective tariff does limit it and proscribe it, will as far as its chains permit exert its strength as one of the great forces of political economy; and he utterly disregarded the fact that increased numbers cause increased production. This is another of the mysteries which envelop this subject; indeed it is so full of mysteries and contradictions that the Senator from Vermont thought proper to intimate in an indirect way that protection is not an exact science. In fact it is necessary to warn reasonable people that there are many things connected with it not reconcilable to the law of truth, neither indeed can be. There is no end to the wonders performed by this remarkable doctrine. It cheapens production of course by adding say 50 per cent. to the price of the article over and above first cost—a species of economical legerdemain which passeth common understanding. It does not, however, pass in strangeness the next proposition, which is that it increases wages. Now, if it increases wages how can it cheapen production? And if it cheapens production how can it increase wages—a large part of the cost of production? Finally, how can it do both and protect manufacturers, and why do they want it? Another wonderful thing performed in the name of this doctrine and by its power is that while it is the cause of all our prosperity, it is never under any circumstances the cause of any of our misfortunes. Nothing but blessings ever come from it. Pious old Job comforted himself in the midst of his afflictions when the Chaldeans had levied a high protective duty on his camels and asses by exclaiming submissively, "Shall we receive good at the hand of God and shall we not receive evil?" but the veneration of the protectionists for the doctrine under which they fatten on the industry of others admits of no such impiety as this. All is good that comes from protection, and the evil that we suffer arises simply from want of more protection.

A favorite form of putting it, which is a kind of affirmative pregnant, is this: they do not say that protection has done all these things directly, but they say that "under the protective system" thus and so has taken place, leaving it to be inferred by the casual or the ignorant that the relation of cause and effect exists between the tariff and those events. With this cautious front and open rear the address of the tariff convention tentatively assures us that production has been increased, water navigation enlarged, railroads built, and all good things generally, came to us by reason of high duties on imports. With precisely the same logic such results might be affirmed of the small-pox, or our Indian wars, "under which" we have undoubtedly prospered.

Nay, the Senator from Vermont goes so far as to claim a hitherto unheard-of beneficence on the part of this policy. He says, "under the protective policy the American farmer holds and cultivates his own land!" This is indeed something new, that you can tax a man until he is actually compelled by his surplus riches to buy a farm and then cultivate it. The landless classes now are absolutely without excuse, since the doctrine is announced by authority that by paying twice the natural price for any article necessary to existence they can acquire homes and cultivate them; "have a surplus at the end of the year for permanent investments or improvements, and educate and bring up their sons and daughters with the advantages and comforts of good society." A man without land under these circumstances ought to be confined as a tramp!

Nor has the attempt to attribute to this policy powers and results bordering on the supernatural been wanting. The wondrous growth of our country is all owing to protection. The Irish rush here in shoals, not because they have any complaint against British rule, but to get to a country where they can be taxed on everything they use. The Germans come in thousands, not because they are drafted and drilled from early youth to old age, but to get to a country where a man can get rich and buy land by the mere process of taxation. They can't do this at home. The Scandinavians come, not because they can get free homesteads in the rich and teeming lands of the West, but because the privileges of a home market and a high tariff are so enticing, they cannot well help coming! The rain and the sunshine, the dew, the mellow soil, and the grand crops of the last few years all come, not from the course of nature and the goodness of God, as some old-fashioned people supposed, but from the tariff. The good prices obtained for our surplus food from the people of Europe were also caused by the tariff, which kept those people at a distance, and repelled their trade as much as possible, and not by the increased facilities and cheaper rates of transit by land and sea, as common sense had vainly imagined.

No greater fallacy is committed—and they are both numerous and great—in the discussion of these economic questions than the one constantly indulged in of contrasting our own country with those of Europe for the purpose of illustrating our superiority. Especially is this illogically done in the comparison of our growth in wealth and population and the price of wages. With the lands and climate we possess, and the inducements of liberty and free homes in a free government which we offer to the world, we could do nothing else than outgrow the crowded countries of Europe. There, by reason of a dense population, land is high because it is scarce, and labor is cheap because it is abundant. Here the conditions are reversed. Land is cheap because it is abundant, and labor is high because it is scarce. All labor, protected and unprotected, skilled and unskilled, is higher here than in Europe, in obedience to the natural law of supply and demand. But the law of gravitation itself would hardly stand any chance before an enthusiastic protectionist, much less a law of trade. If the higher wages of this country were really due to protection, like results would follow in all other countries where the policy prevails.

If to a high protective tariff alone is due the fact that our wages in this country for labor, skilled and unskilled, both protected and unprotected, are much higher than in Europe, why does it happen that the countries in Europe that have high protective tariffs have not also as much prosperity and high wages as we have? The Senator from Maine told us the other day that there were only two powers in the world in favor of free trade—one the Democratic party and the other Great Britain. France is protective; Germany is protective; Norway, Sweden, Denmark are protective; and then that country which we so much admire, that country so near to the heart of every freeman and to every man with a democratic soul in this country, even Russia, so worthy of our imitation—why is not labor high there? Why is there not prosperity there? Why is there not increase of wealth there equal to ours? It is preposterous to suppose that a high protective tariff is the cause of all that. It cannot be; they know it is not; and, strange to say, the only free-trade country in Europe or in the world is England, where wages are nearly double those of any protected country on the continent, and England is richer than all of them, and her trade and riches increase in a greater ratio than any of them. Last year alone she built a million tons of ships, nearly one-third the entire tonnage of the United States. Yet the Senator is melancholy over her decline! Let him save his sorrow for things nearer home. She does 57 per cent. of our carrying trade, and foreign paupers do the rest.

Another favorite argument for this plunder of the public is that it protects and fosters our "infant" manufactures; that without them a nation can never be strong and self-sustaining, &c. Mr. President, no man is better aware of the importance to the prosperity of the people of manufactures than am I. But I know, too, that when demanded by public necessity they always spring up without forcing, as every other industry will; and I know further that they are of no value as factors in the acquisition of wealth unless they are so demanded. But, granting that they need help in starting, I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont as its guardian, how old is that "infant" anyhow; and whether, like Tony Sumpkins, he thinks it will ever arrive at years of discretion? It is, according to my researches, well on to a hundred years old, and still it can't walk or even stand alone. [Laughter.] It promises fair to become the deathless rival of the Wandering Jew, judging by its prolonged youth, only it can't wander, and therefore sticks fast by New England and Pennsylvania. He is the most remarkable boy I ever heard of except the "old boy," whom he much resembles in many respects; remarkable as well for what he can do as for what he can not. He may be properly called the Great American Infant. His inability to stand is in the inverse ratio to the amount of "protection" he receives to help him stand. [Laughter.] When he was born, the wet nurses by his bed, whose hearts were melted by his piteous cries for help against the paupers who sought his life, fed him with a tariff ranging from 5 to 15 per cent. The infant liked it and began to thrive. From time to time, like young Oliver Twist, he called for more; until now, at the age of nearly one hundred years his daily "protection" ranges from 10 per cent. on rags, that most deserving of all young America industries, and diamonds, that most essential one, to 180 per cent. on other articles. And yet he can't stand on his legs. The more he consumes the feebler he gets; the bigger he grows the weaker he becomes. [Continued laughter.] At this rate it will become a serious question with us soon as to whether, if he gets much stronger, it won't take all we have to protect him, and then can't do it. My opinion is that he never will stand while the public will hold him up; that so long as we feed him he will lie on his back, hold on by the grass, and devour the food given him by the American people. Evidently, if not naturally, his infirmities and his appetites increase with age. His food don't seem to have the desired effect; but assuming an abnormal character, he has to all intents and purposes become a vast politico-economical tape-worm in the public anatomy, fit only to consume food provided by others. [Great laughter.] Sometimes, indeed, he puts on an air of most aggressive vigor and boasts loudly of his prowess. One of the speakers at the recent tariff convention said that one of the largest manufacturers of saws in the United States—

> Has a place of business in the city of London. We are exporting from the United States into Canada and the provinces of Great Britain, and we have been enabled by the skill and genius of American mechanics to place upon the market an article with which we can compete with them right in their own market.

And the Senator from Vermont, growing boastful as he recounted the achievments of manufactures, forgot for a moment the feeble character of the great American infant, and exclaimed with much pride:

> Many American productions sustain the character they have won by being the best in the world. Our carpenters and joiners could not be hired to handle any other than American tools; and there are no foreign agricultural implements, from a spade to a reaper, that an American farmer would accept as a gift. There is no saddlery, hardware, nor house furnishing equal in quality and style to American. Watches and jewelry and the electric gold and silver plated ware of American workmanship, as to quality, have the foremost place in the marts of the world. The superiority of our staple cotton goods is indisputable, as is proven by the tribute of frequent counterfeits displayed abroad. The city of Philadelphia alone makes many better carpets, and more in quantity, than the whole of Great Britain. These are noble achievements.

They are indeed; but there is one other and very simple achievement which this great infant cannot perform—he cannot stand on his own legs! Of all the things he has ever done, the grateful millions who have had to hold him up at such vast expense would most delight to see this. For notwithstanding he can compete, according to the confession of his friends, with British pauper labor in their own markets, and can beat the world, according to the Senator, in so many things, yet no sooner does he hear the proposition to let him stand on his own feet than he is seized with a trembling in all his joints, and at the very sight of a pauper he falls down in a fit like old Despair of Doubting Castle; or, like Scotty Briggs when the parson hit out with his left, "he hunts grass." [Prolonged laughter.] Truly he is a terrible infant. I would have said in Parisian terms an "enfant terrible," but I scorn to use the language of a foreign pauper!

There is another peculiarity about this infant: he seems to affect a cold climate, and to rigidly deny to others any portion of the protection which he enjoys. He is jealous of a new baby in the family. Desiring to participate in the protection of this tariff, the people of the South are endeavoring, with small capital and limited experience, to begin manufacturing. Many in my own State are attempting it. Time and time again have they petitioned for leave to bring in machinery for this purpose, duty free; but the Pennsylvania infant refused. Where, then, was your policy of fostering infant manufactures? Some people took a notion that cheap sugar could be manufactured from beets grown on the rich plains of the Northwest, and there was much speculation thereupon. Immediately Congress passed an act removing the tariff from machinery brought in for that purpose. The infant was not even yet born; but being as he was supposed of Northern conception, they hasten to protect him "en ventre sa mére." The North Carolina child is still struggling against both foreign paupers and Massachusetts.

Now, will the Senator from Vermont give this much help to the cotton manufactures of the South? Considering our poverty, that we were scourged by war, "the pestilence that walketh in darkness," and by reconstruction, that destruction that wasted us at noonday, will he not let us have our machinery for a space of time exempt from the Pennsylvania "astintion?" A well-known protectionist, whose name has long been connected with that of infantile ferruginous swine, announced his ardent compassion for the people of the South to the tariff convention in New York recently, and declared his readiness to remove the tax on their "apple whisky;" nay, he went further, and declared it unconstitutional; and with a boldness that did honor to his conscience added that as we did not any longer need the revenue we might now properly obey the Constitution! Will not the Senator be as liberal as that? Free machinery would be of more service to us than free "apple-whiskey," though I confess that we would gladly pay almost any price except an increased tariff to get rid of that rapacious horde who pause awhile, now and then, from their political campaigns to collect the tax on that mysterious beverage.

The interest of ship-building and its fate is still more remarkable, though by no means an infant. It was absolutely destroyed by protection; it died under a high tariff; but, pursuing the practice of Dr. Sangrado, bleeding and hot water, they determined to bring it to life by more protection, and so discriminating duties are levied in favor of American ships—the navigation laws forbid the purchase of any other—and all material for the building and repairing of American ships is admitted free of duty, and still the patient languishes and gets no strength.

Before dismissing this plea of nonage, I would like to ask of anyone competent to answer this question: If American manufacturers, particularly of iron, steel, and cotton, can transport their goods half way round the world and compete with the pauper labor of Europe in those distant markets in a trade which is constantly increasing, why cannot they so compete here at home? That they find a profit in this is fairly presumed since they do it. If so, would there not be still a greater profit in saving the cost of transmitting their goods so far by selling them at home? Or, suppose they take the advice of the Senator from Vermont and manufacture no more than they can sell at home. Why do they want a foreign market if it is not good for farmers?

A continuation of the present tariff they say is necessary to raise revenue, and many ways are suggested of spending that revenue when raised. Arrears of pensions calls for one hundred millions immediately, and many hundreds of millions in the near future. We are also much alarmed about the defenseless condition of our coast, which requires at once to be fortified in the completest manner; and we need a new Navy above all things. Here many hundreds of millions can be sunk very comfortably. With all due respect to everybody, I venture to say that this newborn zeal for the public safety simply covers the desire to continue this tariff which public opinion is so loudly condemning, or to increase it. If they were in earnest to raise revenue, they would agree to lower it. It is apparent to all that by judicious reductions revenue could be raised sufficient for all proper purposes, and to permit the wiping away of the internal-revenue system at the same time, a consummation devoutly to be wished, Heaven knows. In addition to its being the most annoying and vexatious system the American people ever groaned under, it has at the same time been executed, at least in the South, with a few honorable exceptions, with more of harshness and official insolence than freemen can well endure. Its officers, agents, and spies, from the Commissioner down, constitute the chief organization and active working force of the Republican party in the Southern States, and they have not scrupled to pervert their official powers and the laws to the basest party purposes when occasion demanded. It would be doing decency and good government a service to blot out the whole concern, beginning at Jerusalem. Let us tax spirits and tobacco in some other way.

The public debt, too, must be paid; and while the Senator from Vermont does not want it paid too suddenly, he yet wants enough of taxation left "to show that our debt-paying policy is deep-rooted and unalterable." In the light of recent events, I admit that some assurance of that sort is a necessity. We have seen a revenue official in Virginia but a year or so since threatened with instant dismissal from office on the suspicion that he favored repudiation. Only last fall we saw the indignant author of that threat, the Chief of the Internal-Revenue Bureau, take the stump in favor of the ticket which he suspected his subordinates of favoring and, it is said, levy large contributions for the campaign on Federal office-holders in violation of law. And we saw the whole power of the administration, its influence and patronage, exerted in behalf of the "eliminators" of the public debt of that State. And we saw, also, a brave and competent Union soldier, with the scars of honorable battle on his body, summarily ejected from office, though a Republican in his politics, to make room for one whose "debt-paying policy" was not so "deep-rooted and unalterable!" Now, Mr. President, such things are well calculated to make public creditors feel uneasy and require fresh assurances. The repudiation of State debts is so close of kin to the repudiation of national debts that when the chief officials of the Government start in to help on the one for the sake of a small party advantage a timid creditor may well be excused for believing that they would as readily help on the other if the same temptation was presented. The principle being surrendered, the question of expediency becomes the creature of occasion that lies in wait for it. The Senator from Vermont does well to sound the alarm. I will gladly aid him in raising this revenue by lowering the tariff to a constitutional point, and thus giving the whole world an assurance that our "debt-paying policy is deep-rooted and unalterable."

It all comes to this, that statesmen, instead of looking anxiously for the least burdensome taxation to meet the economical needs of the Government, are astute to discover some new means of spending money in order to get the "protection" of increased taxation. The question is not how shall we raise money to support the Government, but how shall we raise more taxes to enrich the manufacturers. The manufacturers are at the bottom of this whole movement. No longer able to resist the clamor against the absurdities and iniquities of a tariff levied for war purposes, they seek to resist the curtailment of these enormous profits as long as possible. A commission gives them two years at least. I should vote against it if for no other reason than the impudence of the protectionists in whose behalf it is offered. They openly avow their purpose and desire to withdraw their interests from the control of the national Legislature, on the ground that Congressmen cannot understand these questions, or, if they understood them, they are not to be trusted with interests so delicate as theirs. In their address to Congress the Iron and Steel Association say, after deprecating any change whatever:

We submit with due respect that such revision of the tariff as these conditions may suggest or demand can best be effected through a commission to be composed of prominent representatives of the leading industries of the country, empowered to make a thorough investigation of the subjects submitted to them, and required to report their conclusions to Congress for approval.

It happens to be necessary that Congress should approve in order to comply with the forms of the Constitution; in no other sense is the interposition of that incompetent body asked or desired. An orator in the recent tariff convention said:

It is far better that that modification should be controlled and managed by men who understand their business, and who have the interest of labor and capital at heart, rather than have it controlled by men who care about nothing but how to get a few more votes.

Still another one said:

We regret exceedingly when Congress convenes. The flock-master is just as uneasy and as much alarmed as he is when he learns that the wolves are after his flocks.

He might have increased the force of his figure by adding, "and a thief is not more alarmed at the approach of a policeman!"

Still another one said:

One word with regard to Michigan and its kindred industries. We do not want any legislative body to pass upon our industries. * * * It must be done by a body of experts, selected from the industries to be represented. It can be done in no other way. [Applause.]

And many more to the same effect. It will be noticed that all of them are unwilling to be tried, as all other classes of society are, by the legislative branch of the Government—and insist on having the plunder they are to levy on the people measured by themselves. How that commission is to be formed it may be well enough for Senators on this side of the Chamber to know, and the information is furnished by yet another orator of that grand conclave of pampered public paupers. "Thus," said he, "for instance, agriculture, mining, ships and commerce, iron and steel, wool and woolen goods, cotton, silk, and other textiles, glass, pottery, &c., drugs and chemicals, &c., might each claim a seat." That is to say, agriculture, which represents only about forty millions of people and three-fourths of the national wealth, shall have a voice in that august commission fully equal to the 5,000 people represented by pottery, or glass, or silk! What could be fairer than that! But hear him further:

It might be necessary that what is loosely called the free-trade element should be represented on the commission, as should also be both political parties. Seeing that the appointments would be made by a Republican President, and that the Republican party is firmly committed to the principle of protection to home industry, it would obviously be right that a majority of the commission should be Republicans, and that a majority should also be distinctly protectionists, but extremists of every kind are to be avoided.

But even this was too liberal. The orator, carried away by the rushing stream of his own generosity, went so far as to incur the rebuke of the plunderers. Their organ, the American Protectionist, publishing his speech with approbation, says:

It contains a single proposition from which we feel compelled to express our dissent. Mr. Wharton argues that in making up the commission it might be well to concede representation to the free-traders. * * * But we think on reflection Mr. Wharton will agree with us that the constitution of the tariff commission should be governed by rules which would not admit of the introduction of enemies into the camp of American industry.

This assumes, first, that all men in this country are either free-traders or protectionists, and that no one thinks of raising any revenue for the Government; and, secondly, that the sole object of the commission is not to change the tariff, up or down, endlong or overthwart, but simply to distribute the plunder! The commission is in fact intended only to arbitrate between the manufacturers, leaving the public Treasury and the people out of the case entirely.

This commission, he says, will make some additions to the free list mostly of "foreign and tropical materials," "advance the tariff in some instances to save an industry or establish a new one," &c., &c. With a commission thus constituted of avowed protectionists and Republicans representing the factories, themselves in control of it, with a representative of the Democratic party and what the chemists would call a trace of free-traders possibly, this gentleman magnanimously concludes, "it is safe to say that the industries will prove in the high court to which they willingly commit their cause that their moderate demands are just and that their interest is the interest of the nation."

Having chosen their own court and constituted the jury with a controlling majority of their own friends, men who, like the famous jury that tried the hog-thief, all had a piece of the pork, and who were to share the booty derived from this raid upon the people's pockets, of course they "willingly submit themselves and their cause" to this tribunal. Was ever impudence like this known among civilized men? And this is the tribunal to which the more than 45,000,000 of American consumers and tax-payers are to look for a redress of their grievances! Instead of reducing the rates, we are told that they are to be advanced; that wherever the executive officers of Government have construed the law against the interests of the protectionists, that breach is to be repaired; and the additions to the free-list are to consist of foreign, and especially tropical raw material, for the use of the manufactories. Nothing is to be made free that the poor use. Salt, almost as necessary as air, is still to continue taxed at 56 per cent.; woolen blankets and all woolen goods at 100 per cent.; kerosene oil, drugs, and medicines at about the same. On that free-list I should love much to see something that favored the poor. Diamonds, jewelry, and precious stones of all kinds are virtually upon it, being only 10 per cent., while mother of pearl is free, cocoanut is free, olives, palm-leaf fans, diamonds uncut, fruit-plants tropical and semi-tropical, fashion-plates, fur-skins, ice, jet, ivory, vermicelli, sandalwood, raw silk, tea, and tin are all free, and more of like nature is to be added; but nothing for the poor; nothing for the great mass of laborers, men, women, and children whose daily toil supports their own and the nation's life. They now throng the lobbies of this Congress and importune its committees; and there is newspaper talk that they will demand the formation of a standing committee of experts, to whom all questions affecting their interests shall be referred. From the ordinary mendicant feeding upon the public purse, they have advanced to the dignity of begging on horseback, as in South America. Like the beggar in Gil Blas, too, they have infused something of a threat into their mendicancy, separating it by the smallest degree from highway robbery. Where are their victims, the farmers, planters, laborers in every department, and the great mass of consumers generally, constituting nine-tenths of the people of the United States? Who is to look after their interests? What commission of experts will determine all questions affecting them? Who will speak a word in behalf of the public Treasury? Shall those who are plundered lie still and submit while those who plunder them labor with a perfect organization and ample means? Verily it would seem so, from all that appears here.

There is indeed a single ray of sunshine amid all this darkness. The cries of the poor have found some hearing, and at last the tender sympathies of the Treasury Department of the Government have generously agreed that the tax on bank-checks and matches may be removed! This will carry joy to the hearts of all the poor—who have money laid up in bank—to hotel proprietors and saloon-keepers, but to the poor farmer who keeps his little hoard in a stocking and covers up his fire at night it will suggest 95 per cent. on blankets and 56 per cent. on salt.

Yes, there is still another rift in the cloud. The tax on patent nostrums, they tell us, may be removed. Joy to the world! Bull's Cough Syrup and Radway's Ready Relief are to be free. Let the earth rejoice! [Laughter.] The poor are to have Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry and Hostetter's Bitters at untaxed prime cost. Let the multitude of the isles clap their hands, for Simmons' Liver Regulator and St. Jacob's Oil are to come to us guiltless of excise abominations! [Continued laughter.] When this happy day shall dawn, then the afflicted American citizen can deluge his insides with miraculous and incomprehensible compounds to his heart's if not his stomach's content, with no tax-gatherers to molest or make him afraid. [Great laughter.] Then, too, shall our reproach among the nations that we tax our people from the cradle to the grave be in great part wiped away, since the means of hastening their departure from a world of misery will be furnished free. And then, too, the Senator from Vermont will have the gratification of seeing even free trade promoting an important industry of his State in the increased demand for tombstones of Rutland marble. [Continued laughter.] Such are the mysteries of trade, and such is the relief which a merciful administration proffers to overtaxed humanity.

Mr. President, the man of least observation can see that in the great struggle for wealth among the family of civilized nations the true strength of our country lies in its agriculture. The God of nature has given us here a monopoly with which the whole earth may not compete. We have sloping toward the Atlantic and the Gulf 700,000 square miles of sun-kissed lands better adapted to the growth of cotton, rice, sugar, and tobacco than any other in Christendom; while for wheat and corn and all that feeds and sustains animal life we have more than 2,000,000 square miles of fair, fat plains, and rolling prairie, such as nowhere else in the shaping of this planet emerged from the primeval seas for the happiness of our race. Here in this western world is a new Egypt, watered by a new Nile, magnified a hundredfold in extent, and glorified still more by the splendor and humanity of its mission in the household of civilization. Seven-eighths of our foreign trade it already furnishes, under every circumstance of repression and discouragement inflicted upon it by a blind and selfish policy. The hungry and overcrowded populations beyond the seas hold out their hands to our stores of plenty as though they were indeed angels' food and the very corn of Heaven. All this wealth, capable of indefinite expansion, is striving to reach the markets of the world, but is stopped by a New England cotton-mill filled with Canadian cheap labor, or a Pennsylvania iron-furnace, and told that a home market is all-sufficient and that tariff taxation is the only avenue opened up whereby agriculture may be saved! True statesmanship says obey the laws of political economy, and those laws point out as plainly as an angel of light that our policy is to encourage, protect, and foster our strong man, the real wealth-giver, the tiller of the soil. This would soon put us ahead of all the world; and as they were required, the arts would flourish in the train of this priest of nature. For the water power is infinite, the raw material is in our midst, the surface of the earth is covered with forests and its bosom is full of metals and coal; and these, under the inspiration of genius and industry, should enable manufacturers to stand against all the world, or confess at once that American manhood is inferior. But instead of this, the strong man of our wealth is weighted down by a tax on every item of his existence and every implement of his industry—a tax as unwise as it is dishonest—for the benefit of those who, they say, cannot earn their own bread as other men earn it! The farmer asks no protection in the shape of tariffs; he simply asks not to be taxed to death for the benefit of others. He wants to be protected against protection.

Protection, so called, a tax imposed on nine men for the sole benefit of one, checks the natural growth and strength of the country.

It is unnatural and unfree, in that it fetters the course of trade, denies the people a choice of markets and the benefits of competition; and a man not free to deal with his goods is no more a free man than if denied the free use of his body and faculties.

It is unjust and unconstitutional, in that it taxes the many for the riches of the few, which is a private and not a public purpose.

It is commercial slavery, for it gives one man's earnings without consideration to another man; and it is therefore dishonest.

It is repugnant to free institutions and undemocratic, insomuch as it tends to concentrate wealth in the hands of the few and establish a privileged class enjoying immunities denied to others, and to gradually sap the foundations of our republican equality and simplicity.

It is illegal; it wars against the well-established laws of political economy, which are applicable alike to the dealings of the inhabitants of the country hamlet and the great family of nations, and are as much God's laws as is the law of gravity; it outrages common sense, defies figures, slays with malice aforethought the principles of addition, division, and subtraction, and rapes the multiplication table.

A tariff for revenue can be rightfully laid; the exigencies of the public service require this. I am willing to aid in framing such a tariff. Such protection as this would afford to all the industries of the country they are fairly entitled to have. Let them learn to be therewith content, and to know that "whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil."

Free land, free labor, free competition, and free ships wherewith to seek free markets, are the great economic truths of modern intelligence, without which the people are not free, and without which prosperity cannot be complete.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not expect to take any time in making any reply to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] and I merely rise to do him the justice that I ought to do in consequence of putting the question to him, as I did during his speech, as to whether he voted for the tariff bill in 1860, or not. I had supposed that he did vote for it because he belonged at that time to what were known as the South Americans, and I remember very distinctly that they were a thorn in the side of the Democracy in those days, and that a part at least of that party voted for the tariff bill. The leader of the party, Mr. Davis of Maryland, was with me one of the sub-committee that reported the tariff bill. The Senator from North Carolina did not vote on the motion to lay upon the table; he did not vote upon the passage of the bill, but was paired with Mr. Dunn of Indiana, who would have voted for the bill.

The Senator from North Carolina, however, did make one speech and a motion, which was to take one article from the free list and place it in the taxable list. The Senator, then as now, had a large repertoire of jokes and infinite jest, and as this speech is very short and to the point, I will read it. It seems that a member from Delaware had perpetrated a practical joke upon North Carolina by proposing that terrapin should be taxed, and as retaliatory of that proposition it is recorded in the Globe that "Mr. VANCE" spoke and moved as follows:

> I move to strike out, in line 79, "pumpkins." I make the motion in deference to the gentleman who has taken the terrapins of my native State under his charge, and for his benefit, and that of his constituents. I have no doubt that a high duty on pumpkins would operate favorably on them. [Laughter.]

That is his entire record in relation to the tariff.

Mr. VANCE. I have no objection to that record, Mr. President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to take the opinion of the Senate once more whether it is willing to consider the Utah question. If there is to be further debate I will change my motion in order to test the sense of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Vermont that the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] has the floor when the regular order is up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The regular order is up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is up and the Senator from Florida has the floor. Does the Senator from Florida yield?

ARREARS OF PENSIONS ACT.

Mr. CALL. I desire to submit some remarks on the resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. With the consent of the Senator from Florida, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have no desire to antagonize the Senator from Vermont on taking up his bill. I want him to get his bill up if he can, and I want as soon as I can to vote for it. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not suppose it is the desire of the Senator from Florida to proceed with the discussion this evening. It is now nearly half past four o'clock. We usually adjourn by five o'clock. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays. I do not wish to discommode my friend from Florida, as he knows; but some day or other the Senate has got to do some business or decline to do it, and as we spend all our time in delivering excellent and elaborate essays, I wish to continually ask the sense of the Senate as to when it is we shall go on to do business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CALL. I have no objection to the Senate going into executive session or to its continuing in open session. If this matter is not to go on this evening I desire to have the floor after the morning hour to-morrow, inasmuch as the subject has been discussed and there are amendments proposed which are quite important, and I shall not occupy a very great part of the time of the Senate. I would prefer to occupy to-morrow morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state to the Senator from Florida that according to the established usage of the Senate, as bad as it may be when we have got nearly one hundred Senators although it was very nice years ago, if I should succeed in getting up this Utah bill I should not feel at liberty to object to his delivering the speech that he desires to make to-morrow; but I wish if possible again to take the sense of the Senate, and very likely for the last time, for I do not wish to fly in the face of the majority, being a democrat myself, as to whether they think this Utah bill of sufficient importance to be taken up as against the mere declaratory resolution of my friend from Kansas. That is all the object I have in view.

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator from Vermont that I think the Senator from Kansas will speak for himself——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CALL. And he has been very solicitous to have a vote on his resolution. He has very kindly given way, and in his behalf I think it is only right before the bill is taken up that the Senator from Vermont should understand that the Senator from Kansas will antagonize his resolution. However that may be, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a short time before the vote is taken on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which motion the Senator from Vermont asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM,] who is ill, I am told, on all political questions, and I see that the Chamber is divided on this vote, so I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. HALE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I see my colleague [Mr. SEWELL] is not in his seat, and I am always paired with him on political questions. I shall not vote under the circumstances.

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

Mr. TELLER, (when his name was called.) I was paired the fore part of the day with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] As he is not here, I refrain from voting. I would vote "nay" otherwise.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GROVER, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] I see he is not in his place, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] and inasmuch as this question appears to have taken a political turn, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. TELLER. My pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has been transferred to the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] and therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. FAIR, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I beg leave to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. JONES, of Nevada.]

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Brown,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Voorhees,
Call,	Groome,	Maxey,	Walker.
Camden,	Hampton,	Pugh,
Coke,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Vest,

NAYS—29.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McDill,	Saunders,
Allison,	Farley,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Garland,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman,
Bayard,	Harris,	Miller of N. Y.,	Teller,
Blair,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Windom.
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Dawes,	Ingalls.	Rollins.

ABSENT—36.

Beck,	George,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Butler,	Grover,	Lapham,	Sewell,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Logan,	Slater,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McPherson,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,	Van Wyck,
Fair,	Johnston,	Mitchell,	Williams.
Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Morgan,
Frye,	Kellogg,	Pendleton,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not desire to press my friend from Florida to go on with his observations to-night, and if it should be the pleasure of the Senate to take up the Utah question I will cheerfully give way to-morrow morning in order that the Senate may hear what he has to say. I hope he will understand that I had no personal opposition to his being heard. My motion was to postpone because I do not wish to have the resolution of my friend from Kansas lose its place on the Calendar, and so I did not move to lay it upon the table. The motion was to postpone its consideration until to-morrow, which, if carried, will enable me to move to take up the Utah bill, on which to-morrow I will cheerfully yield to my friend from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone until to-morrow the pending resolution, being the resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

The motion was agreed to.

PUNISHMENT OF BIGAMY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 353.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 353) to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not think there is much necessity for an executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to give notice that I shall ask the Senate to dispose of the bill that will be the unfinished business to-morrow. The subject has awakened a great deal of public attention, has been discussed, and is perfectly understood I am sure by everybody, and I shall hope that the Senate will dispose of it to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 14, 1882.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the formal part of the Journal relating to the introduction of bills be omitted in the reading.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The remaining portion of the Journal was then read and approved.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that there be a reprint ordered of the bill (H. R. No. 4167) to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, together with the accompanying report, as the regular edition is exhausted and there is a large demand for the document.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DAVID C. PAULLUS.

Mr. BROWNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4430) for the relief of David C. Paullus; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SEWELL COULSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. BROWNE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4431) for the payment of Sewell Coulson and Porter, Harrison and Fishback for legal services; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to present a memorial of the officers of the city government, committee of citizens, and heads of numerous commercial and industrial departments of the city of Vicksburgh, Mississippi, respecting the harbor improvements, to the General Government of the United States, and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the memorial, which is brief, be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. The memorial is as follows:

To the Honorable the Representatives and Senators of the State of Mississippi in Congress:

SIRS: The undersigned were appointed by the mayor and aldermen of the city of Vicksburgh, and by the citizens in mass meeting assembled, to memorialize Congress through you on the necessity of obtaining Congressional aid for the relief and improvement of our harbor and river channel

The urgency and importance of this work cannot be overlooked, delayed, or overestimated. You are already aware that the ever-shifting channel of the Mississippi River, whose waters wash the western boundary of a very large portion of our State relying upon this city as its commercial headquarters, is constantly exposing millions of valuable property to serious damage and often ingulfing it in total ruin. We are now menaced with such a calamity. As a purely commercial city, having our chief trade by the river—being the largest city in the State—and doomed to perish with the loss of navigation, we respectfully call your attention to the facts in our situation.

Our city, owing to the alluvial delta and numerous streams and rivers therein on the north, is the first gate of access to the interior portions of this great cotton-growing belt, after leaving Memphis, in a distance of four hundred miles by water. It is the center of several railroad systems, and the crafts on the navigable waters of many valuable rivers, the Yazoo, Sunflower, Deer Creek, Tallahatchie, Cold Water, Yallobusha, and others, are, with the hundreds of gigantic steamers on the chief rivers, constantly seeking our harbor as the great point for the concentration and distribution of the products of the water-sheds of the West and South. Several hundred thousands of our population in the State at large are dependent on this port, in so much that it becomes a matter of general interest to the entire people. Large sums of money have been expended by enterprising citizens in giving all needed facility to the handling, storing, compressing, and shipping of cotton. Thousands of dollars have been expended by the city in its corporate capacity, as well as by private citizens, to preserve and maintain a navigable harbor and accessible landing on the river, but the work has only proved the impossibility of any other than the national power coping with the ravages of its currents.

Cheered with the numerous evidences of a new South and the nationalization of interests hitherto regarded as sectional and subordinate, your memorialists had entered heartily into the momentous work of rebuilding the fallen fortunes, and reorganizing the disarranged trade, transportation, commercial, and agricultural interests of our favored locality, hoping in a few years to stand abreast with our fellow-citizens of other more prosperous parts of our common country. Misfortune has nevertheless followed us. Our hopes have been partially blighted; our energies somewhat paralyzed; our business facilities abridged, and are now threatened with still greater disaster, and, unless national assistance be promptly afforded, we fear with ultimate ruin.

The loss of the river, rendering our port wholly inaccessible, will destroy the city with its millions of valuable improvements. Nor is it a practicable thing to find another site for business, free from the perils of inundations, to meet the necessities of trade.

You are aware that in 1876 the river cut through the narrow peninsula projected in front of our city, which had bounded it from immemorial time, and shortening its course left our city more than a mile from the banks of the stream. The distance has been constantly increasing, until now, in low water, our city is nearly two miles from practicable navigation, while with constantly caving banks and the consequent fluctuations of its channel we may expect mile after mile to be added to the lengthening distance, until the final catastrophe.

Appropriations heretofore made by the General Government, and expended in protecting from abrasion the delta point, have contributed to the partial arrestment of the receding channel, but that was a work deemed by the distinguished engineers having it in charge only preliminary to a more permanent and valuable plan of restoring the harbor to its original utility.

To the general features of that plan we beg very respectfully to call your attention. The old channel of the river in front of the city having, by the natural deposits of the sediment of the waters, been so filled up as to arrest all navigation except in very high water, it is now proposed to commence at the proper depth of low-water navigation on the margin of the river and excavate a canal two hundred feet wide, by a depth of fifteen feet below low water, running in a northerly direction, and terminating in a basin in front of the city; this basin to be six hundred feet in width and eighteen hundred feet long. This plan has been adopted by the engineers of the United States after thorough investigation, numerous experiments with the silt deposits, and trials of the modes of proposed operation, so as to learn the force of the probable and apparent obstacles and their value as factors in the solution of the problem in hand. Everything considered they deem it the simplest and most economical of the many schemes that have heretofore been ingeniously devised and freely suggested. And, withal, the plan of a basin and canal admits of a pretty accurate estimate of its cost before the work is begun. Less than 2,000,000 of cubic yards will have to be dredged and removed, and once done it is not likely there will ever again arise any serious hinderance to the permanent use of the improvement.

Permit us to direct your attention to the annexed map of the plan. In front of the city of Vicksburgh you will see the basin and canal running to the left and terminating in the deep waters of the river's margin on the south.

Major Benyaurd, United States engineer, in his report for 1831, says that "Mr. T. G. Dabney, assistant engineer, shows that there has been no perceptible filling up of the inner harbor for the past two seasons. A channel can therefore be dredged from the lower limits of the fill to the elevator." All the estimates for this work have been carefully calculated and submitted for the approval and indorsement of the river commission, which they have readily and cheerfully given. The estimates and cost are set forth in their last report for 1881, to which we beg leave to refer as part of this memorial. In that report they say, "It is estimated that the necessary dredging will cost $336,000, while the completion of the delta-point revetment will cost $100,000 more, a total of $436,000, of which $250,000 can be profitably expended in one year"—the fiscal year ending June 3, 1883.

It would be a waste of time and a work of supererogation for us to set forth the readiness and ampleness with which the General Government has heretofore, in innumerable instances, hastened to the relief of its citizens in like peril all over the broad extent of our riparian possessions.

But this much we beg leave to suggest, that to avoid lavish expenditure, waste, and loss, it is of the greatest moment that Congress avoid the pernicious custom of so disregarding the careful and conscientious estimates made for work to be done by Government officers as to reduce those estimates, and thus leave them with means inadequate to the ends to be secured, which must, as heretofore has often been the case, end in total loss.

So deeply impressed are we with a sense of our peril and necessity, and the demand for immediate relief, that we make our earnest appeal for the required appropriation at the earliest practicable moment.

Finally, we rejoice to know that this great river is assuming its natural and legitimate place as an inland sea—the Mediterranean of the West—and is commanding the attention of broad-minded and unsectional statesmen everywhere in virtue of its boundless capacity for cheap transportation and its vital importance to the rapidly increasing production as well as the commercial power of the people dwelling upon the soil it drains. To such statesmen we turn our eyes and direct our memorial of the perils and necessities of our surroundings.

We beg, as a further elucidation of our cause and claims, to submit the following communications from the United States engineers, eminent in their profession. (See page 8.)

Relying upon your favorable indulgence and attention, we have the honor to be, Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

FILLING UP OLD CANAL.

Mr. URNER. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution (S. R. No. 30) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the ground south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes, in order that it may be put upon its passage at this time. If the Chair will bear with me I will state that this joint resolution of the Senate simply provides for an appropriation to complete the filling up of the old canal. Appropriations were made in 1879, 1880, and 1881. The work is now completed to M street, but it requires another appropriation to finish it. This appropriation is asked for by the commissioners of the District of Columbia in order that there may be given employment at this time to a great many poor people who are out of employment. This will give them work and keep them from becoming objects of charity upon the District. It is asked in the interest of humanity as well as in the interest of the District.

Mr. McMILLIN. I desire to know from the gentleman from Maryland what amount this joint resolution proposes to appropriate.

Mr. URNER. Twenty thousand one hundred and fourteen dollars. It is the amount which has been reported by the commissioners of the District of Columbia under the ascertainment of Lieutenant Greene. It is the amount required to finish the work, and when made no further appropriation will be asked for by the District for this purpose.

Mr. McMILLIN. This is an early hour and the House is not full yet, and I do not think it should be taken up; and therefore I object to its present consideration.

Mr. URNER. Is it not too late to object?

The SPEAKER. The title was read in order that the House might understand the question. The subject is not before the House.

MRS. TEMPERANCE S. ERICKSON.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, by unanimous consent, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4129) for the relief of Mrs. Temperance S. Erickson; and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. BOWMAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That in Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar it shall be in order to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, exclusive of the time occupied by the Clerk in the reading of the bill and report, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition. This rule may be suspended at any time in any particular case by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

SETH CALVIN.

Mr. WEBBER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4432) for the relief of Seth Calvin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the Chair will now submit several executive communications for reference.

There was no objection.

PEÑA BLANCA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting papers in the New Mexico private land claim Peña Blanca; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

JOSEPH H. BLAZEO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the Indian depredation claim of Joseph H. Blazeo; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JAMES C. DUANE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying papers, relative to the claim of Lieutenant-Colonel James C. Duane; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

WEIGHING OF MAIL MATTER ON TRUNK LINES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of January 31, copies of all correspondence relative to the mail-weighing on the trunk line of railroads between New York and Chicago; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ARIZONA PRIVATE LAND CLAIM ARIBAC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a plat of the preliminary surveys of the Arizona private land claim Aribac; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

COHANSEY LIGHT HOUSE, NEW JERSEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Light-House Board, requesting an appropriation of $1,000 for the purchase of additional land near the Cohansey Light-house, New Jersey; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FILES IN POSTMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, requesting that the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department be authorized to sell as waste paper, or otherwise dispose of, such of the files of his office as are not needed in the transaction of current business, or have no permanent value or historic interest; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ISAAC H. BUSH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the Indian depredation claim of Isaac H. Bush; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MILITIA FORCE OF UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 232 of the Revised Statutes, an abstract of the militia force of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT WALTER F. HALLECK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition and accompanying papers of First Lieutenant Walter F. Halleck, retired, asking to be granted the rank and pay of lieutenant-colonel on the retired list; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LAND CLAIM OF SAN RAPHAEL DE LA ZANJA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting additional papers in the Arizona private land claim of San Raphael de la Zanja; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

CHANGE OF LIGHTS, CHICAGO HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Light-House Board, stating that it has been deemed advisable to change the lights in the harbor of Chicago, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT BELLE ISLE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Light-House Board requesting an additional appropriation of $6,000 for the completion of the light-house on the northern end of Belle Isle, Detroit River, State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CHARLES EWING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of January 30, 1882, all the papers relating to the claim of Charles Ewing against the Osage Indian Nation; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. BOWMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 684) to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Department, in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government, with the accompanying report, be printed in the RECORD for the use and information of members.

There was no objection. The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 684) to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

SEC. 2. That when a claim or matter is pending in any of the Executive Departments which may involve controverted questions of fact or law, the head of such Department may transmit the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to said court, and the same shall be there proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts and conclusions of law shall have been found, the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report its findings and opinions to the Department by which it was transmitted for its guidance and action.

SEC. 3. That the Attorney-General, or his assistants under his direction, shall appear for the defense and protection of the interests of the United States in all cases which may be transmitted to the Court of Claims under this act, with the same power to interpose counter-claims, offsets, defenses for fraud practiced or attempted to be practiced by claimants, and other defenses in like manner as he is now required to defend the United States in said court.

SEC. 4. That in the trial of such cases no person shall be excluded as a witness because he or she is a party to or interested in the same.

SEC. 5. That reports of the Court of Claims to Congress under this act, if not finally acted upon during the session at which they are reported, shall be continued from session to session and from Congress to Congress until the same shall be finally acted upon.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill "to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," have considered the same, and make the following report:

The only question presented to this committee for their consideration by the above-named bill is whether Congress and its committees and the Executive Departments shall have the privilege or right, if they deem it advisable, to have the facts in any case before them properly investigated by a tribunal which can ascertain these facts in a legal manner, in the same mode adopted by the courts which have jurisdiction of similar causes, and with the safeguard to the Government of the power of cross-examination of witnesses, all of which is impossible to be accomplished by Congress, its committees, or the Executive Departments.

This committee desire to call especial attention to the fact that the bill under consideration is only a permissive one, and imposes no obligation whatever upon Congress or a committee to send any matter to the Court of Claims for investigation, or to part with any of their powers or privileges.

The objections (and they have some weight) which have been urged against previous bills in Congress for the reference of all claims to the Court of Claims, and which have contributed to and probably been the cause of their defeat, are that in regard to a large class of these claims the question of whether the claimant is entitled to relief, and, if so, what amount he should recover, is purely a question of judgment and discretion, and in many cases may be regarded as one of liberality and benevolence; that in very many of these claims the damages are not liquidated, and there is no legal mode of ascertaining their amount, and that therefore in all such cases this large discretion can only safely be intrusted to Congress. In other words, the argument has been that where there is a legal measure of damages, so that the amount thereof can be legally fixed and determined, such cases can be properly referred to a legal tribunal; but where there is no such measure, and the only one is the discretion of the tribunal in charge of the case, the jurisdiction should be retained by Congress.

This committee do not propose and do not feel called upon to discuss this question at present. The present bill being permissive only, it would seem that it must be regarded by every member of Congress as at least an unobjectionable one, and it is reported in the hope that it may immediately pass and thus grant relief at once to Congress and this committee, and other committees, overloaded by large dockets of cases. If a more sweeping bill of the nature above referred to, or one transferring all claims absolutely to the Court of Claims, shall hereafter come before Congress for action, this committee, as a whole or as individuals, will then consider the question when it shall be presented. It is not necessary to do so now, and this question is not raised and need not be raised upon the bill now under consideration.

As to Congress, this bill simply grants permission to Congress or a committee to have the facts in any given case ascertained by the Court of Claims, provided Congress or such committee shall vote that such reference or disposition of the case is advisable.

The advisability of some such judicial mode of ascertainment of facts in cases before Congress would seem to require no argument, and the utter absurdity, as well as injustice, both toward claimants and the Government, of the present mode of examining into and ascertaining such facts would seem to require no description or comment.

A claim against Government is referred to a committee of the House; for example, the Committee on Claims. By that committee it is referred to a sub-committee, usually of one. He takes the papers, and has before him generally nothing but letters, certificates, and some affidavits. The evidence is wholly ex parte. There is no cross-examination or opportunity for it, no depositions, no way of testing the truth or falsity of statements of the case. A dishonest affidavit or other paper may be as finely written, as well drawn, as honest-looking as a just one, and have the same external marks of truth. No general mode has yet been devised of deciding by the mere appearance of papers whether they are false or true, and yet in many cases it is almost the only test that a committee can apply. It is true that, in regard to some claims, the evidence (if it can be so called) on file in the case can be verified to some extent by records in the Departments, but this is not always the case.

If a man should suggest that in the case of claims in court against individuals such claims should be tried wholly on the evidence of the claimant, by ex parte affidavits in his behalf, by letters and other documents, not under oath; without any opportunity of inspecting or confronting witnesses by court, counsel, or parties; without any chance for cross-examination, and without any opportunity for the defendant to be heard in his own behalf, he would very properly be regarded as a lunatic; and yet this is exactly what is done in the case of claims against the Government of vast importance, and involving in the aggregate many millions of dollars.

Under such a system mistakes will occur, even when the claimants are entirely honest in the prosecution of their claims; and of this the case of Charles J. Davis, administrator of John Davis, vs. The United States (10 Court of Claims Rep., 225) is a notable instance. In this case the heirs of John Davis, a revolutionary soldier, applied to Congress for commutation for his half pay for life, due him by the statute. The committee of the Thirty-first Congress made a favorable report, and that of the Thirty-third likewise reported a bill, which passed the House; subsequently the heirs applied to the Court of Claims, and in the course of the defense by the Attorney-General it was discovered that a full receipt for the commutation had been filed in 1784 in the auditor's office of Pennsylvania, and the court decided against the claimants, finding, however, that they had acted in perfect good faith.

Unjust, however, to the Government as is the present mode of ascertaining and passing upon claims, it is still more unjust and more of a hardship to the honest claimant.

It is the duty of Congress, as the representative of the Government, to facilitate as far as possible honest creditors of the Government in obtaining payment of their claims, and to enable them to obtain such payment with the least possible delay, trouble, and expense. How far this is from the fact needs no argument to those familiar with the prosecution or hearing of claims before Congress.

One able to pay his debts and neglecting and refusing to do so forfeits his claim to be considered an honorable man; how much more dishonorable is it on the part of a great government to refuse or neglect to pay its honest and almost always needy creditors, and yet the obtaining through Congress final payment of a just claim is a work of so much delay, trouble, doubt, and expense that such a claim, however valid, honest, and unquestioned, is almost worthless. Take the case of a private claim against Government, which requires the interposition of Congress, and which is unquestioned and unquestionable, and may be certified to in the most solemn way by Government officials; it is probably no exaggeration to say that 10 per cent. of its amount would not be given for that claim by men who from experience were familiar with the risks, delays, and troubles attending the prosecution in Congress of claims against the Government. It may be fairly stated that honest claims against the Government, requiring an act of Congress, are worth very little, if anything. No man acting on business principles, and as a business matter, would be willing to pay much for such a claim or consider it of any commercial value. In session after session, and in Congress after Congress, and year after year, claimants clamor for payment, grow old in the struggle for it, and they and their heirs after them continue to besiege Congress in the usually vain hope that at last they may receive their honest dues. One great cause of this unjust and illegal denial of justice to claimants is the immense mass of business of this nature pressing upon a Congress already overburdened with public matters, and with the investigation and management of an immense and continually-increasing public business, so that it is utterly impossible for even its committees to turn themselves into judicial tribunals for carefully weighing evidence and passing judgment in such cases.

The docket of the Committee on Claims of the last Congress contained 1,048 cases, and that of the same committee of the present Congress already contains nearly one thousand. It is obvious that comparatively few of these cases can be reached for action, even in committee. By allowing the Court of Claims in these cases, where the committee deem it advisable, to take upon itself the labor of investigating and reporting upon the facts, the committees and Congress must be relieved of by far the greater part of their labors, not only by reason of the avoidance of the protracted work of examining in detail all the evidence, often very voluminous, but also to a perhaps greater extent by the fact (heretofore shown to be true by similar experience in regard to classes of cases committed to the Court of Claims) that when claimants find that their cases are to be subjected to a judicial examination, and that they must bring proper proof of their alleged facts, they will not prosecute them, and the worthless cases will be winnowed out, and disappear from the dockets of committees and of courts. Congress and committees by this means rid themselves of all the burdens and labors of investigation of claims and still retain entire control of their final allowance.

The great difficulty heretofore has been to ascertain the true facts, and committees and Congress will have little difficulty, comparatively, if they are furnished with those facts by a tribunal in which they have confidence. Such confidence, it is believed, will be felt by any Congress in the concurrent decision or opinion as to the facts of a case, by five judges, trained in investigating claims and deciding upon legal evidence.

This subject is at least of sufficient magnitude and importance to render it advisable to try the, in any event, harmless experiment proposed by this bill. While it will cost the Government nothing, except possibly some additional printing, and will demand no increase in the judicial or clerical force of the court, as appears by the communication from the justices of that court, which is hereto annexed, (to the suggestions in which the attention of the House is especially called,) the amount of relief which it will give to Congress can only be told in the future. The need of some legislation of this kind is forcibly shown in an article (which applies also to the present time) in the Southern Law Review on the "history, jurisdiction, and practice of the Court of Claims of the United States," from which the following is an extract:

"Previous to the year 1854 the accumulation of private claims against the Government of the United States presented to Congress for examination and relief had, at various times, engaged the attention of Senators and Representatives. It was seen and acknowledged by them all that it was beyond the power of Congress or its committees to make a thorough investigation of those claims, or to act intelligently upon the large and constantly increasing number of petitions introduced at each session in behalf of persons having claims of various kinds for which they sought relief. Claimants had gone to Congress, and would continue to go there, as a matter of right secured to them by the first article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States guaranteeing to the people the privilege to petition the Government for redress of grievances.

"It was seriously felt both in and out of Congress that the constitutional guarantee was of little value, and was substantially violated if private claimants against the Government were allowed merely the naked right to have their petitions presented without any further investigation and consideration.

"To neglect to hear petitions, or not to act upon their complaints, when heard, was practically the same to them as would be the effect of a law expressly abridging the right of petition in direct and flagrant violation of the Constitution. And yet such was the extent of these claims, and the difficulty of reaching the real facts in each case, that few of them were ever acted upon, and many honest creditors of the United States were turned away without a hearing, and others were deterred from presenting their petitions for redress by the difficulties in the way of ever reaching a final determination, while it was occasionally found that a claim was allowed and paid upon hasty consideration or imperfect ex parte evidence, which was, to say the least, of doubtful validity. Committees could not constitute themselves courts for the trial of facts. They had not the time to devote to that kind of investigation, to the interruption or exclusion of their duties to the country on the great national questions which were always pending in Congress. They could not examine and cross-examine the claimant's witnesses to any great extent before themselves, and they were not sufficiently familiar with the matters in controversy to be able to procure witnesses for the defense. Claimants, in fact, presented only ex parte cases, supported by affidavits and the influence of such friends as they could induce to appear before the committees in open session, or see the members in private. No counsel appeared to watch and defend the interests of the Government. Committees were therefore perplexed beyond measure with this class of business, and most frequently found it more convenient and more safe not to act at all upon those claims which called for much investigation, especially when the amounts involved seemed large. Moreover, when bills for relief in meritorious cases were reported, few of them were acted upon by either House, or if passed by one, were not brought to a vote in the other House, and so fell at the final adjournment, and, if ever revived, had to be begun again before a new Congress and a new committee, and so on, year after year and Congress after Congress.

* * * * * * * *

"It has been often asserted and proved by the experience of the British Parliament that legislative bodies are unfitted by the pressure of great public interests from careful judicial investigation into private rights. The consequence has been in our country that claims accumulated until their magnitude repressed all willingness to investigate them, and a state of things arose which made it hopeless almost to present a claim against the United States with any prospect of a decision."

The committee of the Forty-sixth Congress on Reform in the Civil Service (Forty-sixth Congress, second session, report 198) presented a report in which this subject is very fully discussed.

This committee therefore report back the accompanying bill, and recommend that the same do pass.

APPENDIX.

CHAMBERS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1882.

To the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives:

GENTLEMEN: We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 19th instant, containing a resolution requesting the opinion of the judges of this court as to whether the passage of House bill No. 684, entitled "A bill to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," would necessitate an increase in the number of judges or in the clerical force of the court, and whether the present justices will be able to attend to all the business that will probably come to the court if the bill should be enacted; and also requesting them to furnish any suggestions that to them may seem proper in regard to the bill.

Having given the subject careful consideration, we beg leave to submit the following reply:

That the passage of the bill would not necessitate an increase in the number of judges or in the clerical force of the court admits of no doubt. As the court is organized, all the judges sit together in the hearing of cases, and each judge gives his personal attention and consideration to the facts and law of each case, unless some one is unavoidably absent. The law expressly requires the concurrence of three judges to the decision of any case.

An increase in the number would only add more judges to go over precisely the same ground, and therefore would afford no aid in the dispatch of business.

The provisions of the bill as to the inception of cases appear to be permissive only, allowing either House of Congress, or any committee, or the head of any Executive Department, to send such matters to the court as they see fit for findings of fact, &c., reserving to them the right to determine what matters before them are of sufficient importance for submission to a judicial investigation.

From past experience we are of opinion that the present judges (five, when there is no vacancy) will be able to attend to all the business that will probably come to the court if the bill be enacted.

The business of the court has frequently been increased by special matters of jurisdiction referred to it by Congress, such as the abandoned and captured property cases, under the act of March 12, 1863; cases against the District of Columbia, under the act of June 16, 1880; and numerous cases and classes of cases referred by private acts. It is found that such cases bring in new litigants and new counsel, who prepare and submit their cases while others are in preparation and do not obstruct the general business. Litigants are always promptly heard whenever their cases are ready for submission, and the court promptly decides them, and the business has never been in arrears; so that the extent of business which the court may transact can hardly be estimated.

As to the merits of the bill which is specially designed for the relief of Congress the judges cannot properly make any suggestions.

They submit to the wisdom of the law-making power, and will cheerfully and faithfully undertake whatever duty Congress shall impose upon them.

It will not be out of place, however, to say, in response to the request for suggestions, that the provisions of the bill requiring the court to make findings of fact have a precedent in the proceedings of the Supreme Court. When Congress gave to litigants the right of appeal to that court from the Court of Claims, the judges of the Supreme Court, in 1866, adopted a rule that this court should in each case make "a finding of the facts established by the evidence, in the nature of a special verdict but not the evidence establishing them." These findings present all the facts upon which the Supreme Court reviews the judgments and decisions of this court, and the practice thus established by the Supreme Court, so far as we are informed, has proved entirely satisfactory to both courts and to the litigants.

We are, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

C. D. DRAKE, Chief Justice.
CHARLES C. NOTT,
WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
GLENNI W. SCOFIELD,
Judges.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUBBELL. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely the petition of Josiah Shinkle, asking compensation for saving the steamer Echo; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

O STREET (NORTHWEST) ALLEY.

Mr. GARRISON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back adversely the petition that the alley in Washington known as O Street (Northwest) alley, be closed; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WITNESSES.

Mr. JOYCE, from the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3925) to amend sections 184 and 185 of title 4, Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PERJURY.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3921) to amend sections 5392 and 5393 of chapter 4, title 70, of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FEES OF PENSION EXAMINING SURGEONS.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3924) fixing the fees of pension examining surgeons; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PENSIONERS.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2713) to extend the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of certain pensioners," approved March 3, 1879, to certain other pensioners; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXAMINATION OF PENSION CLAIMS.

Mr. JOYCE also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3918) to amend section 4744, title 57, Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ARREST AND DETENTION OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

Mr. ORTH, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby directed to communicate to this House his opinion in writing on the following question:

If JOSEPH WARREN KEIFER, Speaker of this House, or Alonzo B. Cornell, governor of the State of New York, or Charles Carroll, a laborer in the department of public works in the city of New York, being a citizen of the United States, visit any part of the British Empire, and should there be arrested without having committed any crime, and without any definite charge of crime being alleged against him, could the English Government, by suspending the habeas corpus, or otherwise, lawfully detain him indefinitely on suspicion without trial or without any right in our Government to demand his release? Also his opinion on the application of the law of July 29, 1868, to such cases, and the President's duty under it.

Mr. ORTH. I ask for the reading of the accompanying report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have had this resolution under consideration, and instruct me to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the same be laid upon the table.

GODLOVE S. ORTH.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. If it is in order to say anything on it, I now claim the floor.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I wished to speak a few minutes, but was indifferent whether the House listens to me or not. I however demand a division.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let the resolution be reread.

The SPEAKER. The House is dividing.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have a right to call for the reading of that paper.

The SPEAKER. The paper has been read once.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know that, but where a division is called we have the right to have the paper again read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be again reported. There is a limit to which bills and resolutions can be read pending a division. There is no objection, and the resolution will be again reported.

Mr. COX, of New York. After a division has been called for the Chair will see the propriety and logic of having the resolution reread.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has only called attention to the rule and has no objection to the resolution being again reported.

The resolution was again read.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 45.

Mr. COX, of New York. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBESON. The yeas and nays on what?

Mr. COX, of New York. On the resolution reported from the Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. The yeas and nays on the motion that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to know whether a resolution of this character, which directs the Attorney-General to give an opinion to this House, is in order. There is no constitutional power——

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. The gentleman from New Jersey has no right to debate if that right is refused to other members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear one point of order at a time.

Mr. ROBESON. There is no constitutional power in this House to direct the Attorney-General to give an opinion to the House on a hypothetical case. His duty is to advise the Executive. You cannot call upon him and demand an opinion. You may demand an account of his actions and conduct, but not his opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that whether the objection or point of order is well taken or otherwise is not now a matter for consideration, as it comes too late.

Mr. ROBESON. I only make it in order that the House may know what it is doing.

Mr. BLACK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK. Will the Chair state whether the vote is to be taken on the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. COX, of New York. That is the motion, and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which is that this resolution be laid upon the table; on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 102, not voting 73; as follows:

So the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. THOMAS with Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. FARWELL, of Illinois, with Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois.

Mr. CORNELL with Mr. NOLAN.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, with Mr. ARMFIELD.

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. MORSE.

Mr. CONVERSE with Mr. DWIGHT.

Mr. CHACE with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. CURTIN with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. ATHERTON with Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. CABELL with Mr. DEZENDORF.

Mr. DEUSTER with Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. MCCOOK with Mr. VAN VOORHIS.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. BARR.] If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

Before the announcement of the vote, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry, not of the Chair, however, because, with all respect, inasmuch as the question submitted here involves the Chair, I do not wish the Chair to be even hypothetically imprisoned. [Laughter.]

But a division was called for on these two resolutions, and I suppose a motion to lay on the table takes both.

I desired, however, in order to perfect the resolution, not to lay it upon the table, because underlying it is a very important principle of American citizenship, which——

Mr. WILLETS. I rise to a point of order. The question is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is not in order to make a speech. If he has a parliamentary inquiry to address to the Chair, the Chair will hear it.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I will make a parliamentary inquiry. Does the motion now to lay on the table take both resolutions?

The SPEAKER. It takes only the resolution that has been submitted to the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I appologize to the Chair, and would like to have the same chance that the gentleman from New Jersey had to make a speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey did not undertake to interpolate a speech during the announcement of the vote. But the gentleman from New Jersey may have been out of order also.

Mr. COX, of New York. No doubt he was, and I thank the Chair for that suggestion. [Laughter.]

The result of the vote was then announced, as above stated.

Mr. ORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I rose to make the motion to reconsider, and spoke loud enough, but failed to catch the Speaker's eye.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York was not entitled to make the motion.

The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

D. H. O'CONNOR.

Mr. ORTH. I also report back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public service, be requested to communicate to this House all correspondence with the British Government on file in the State Department with reference to the case of D. H. O'Connor, a citizen of the United States, now imprisoned in Ireland.

Mr. ORTH. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have had this resolution under consideration, and instructed me to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the same be laid on the table.

February 13, 1882. GODLOVE S. ORTH.

Mr. ORTH. The Committee on Foreign Affairs recommend that this resolution be laid on the table, because the information asked for is embraced in a resolution which has already passed the House.

The question being taken, on a division by sound the Speaker stated that in the opinion of the Chair the "ayes" had it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I call for a division.

Mr. SCALES. Was I correct in understanding the gentleman from Indiana to say that a resolution embracing this had already passed the House?

Mr. ORTH. Yes, such a resolution has already passed the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like to have the House understand that the joint resolution which the gentleman from Indiana reported the other day includes all these specific cases.

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. But I would like to have the opportunity, if I could, to amend this resolution so as to carry out more effectively the provision of section 2000 of the Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order when the House is dividing.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 56.

Mr. ORTH. I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 21; not a sufficient number.

Mr. ORTH. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, 42 members voting therefor; and Mr. ORTH, and Mr. COX of New York, were appointed to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 71, noes 79.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. COX, of New York. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. NEAL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NEAL. As I understand, this is a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the morning hour. If that is so, it is not subject to consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. It is not in the morning hour.

Mr. COX, of New York. My amendment is a substitute for the proposition of the committee.

Mr. KENNA. I ask that the original resolution and the amendment be read.

The resolution was again read.

The amendment proposed by Mr. COX, of New York, as a substitute, was also read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to obtain for D. H. O'Connor and other American citizens now imprisoned under a suspension of the habeas corpus by the British Government in Ireland, without trial, conviction, or sentence, a speedy and fair trial or a prompt release."

Mr. POUND. I desire to submit a point of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the point of order raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. POUND. I understand that the resolution under consideration is a resolution of inquiry. This amendment proposes to instruct the President with reference to his duty and is not germane.

Mr. COX, of New York. The resolution referred to the committee comes back, and is now in possession of the House for amendment. It is too late to make that point now. The resolution is before the House, the Chair having declared it to be open for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is open for consideration, but it does not follow that amendments that are not germane to it are in order.

Mr. COX, of New York. The point of order was made too late.

The SPEAKER. The point of order was made at as early a time as it could be made.

Mr. KASSON. I want to reserve further points of order until this is settled.

Mr. COX, of New York. On the question of the amendment being germane, I will say it relates to the same question and the same subject-matter as the resolution now before the House; and the House can give its mature views on the proposition as it comes from the committee by adopting this if it chooses. It relates to the duty of the United States in regard to its citizens.

Mr. CANNON. Have we got information as to these cases? Do we know anything about them officially?

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Illinois can vote against the amendment if he does not know enough about it.

Mr. CANNON. My question is whether the House has official information about it.

Mr. COX, of New York. That does not bear on the point of order, but is an argumentation of the question which would properly come up on its merits.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say that a resolution of inquiry has certain privileges of prompt report from a committee and prompt action. A resolution instructing a public officer stands on a different basis. I should be glad myself to know the facts in respect to these other persons before being called upon to instruct the President of the United States. And if the cases which are added to the resolution called for this action I should prefer it should be recommitted to the committee to make the necessary preliminary inquiries. The other persons included in the resolution are not known to us; they may be known to the gentleman from New York, and the facts about them may be known to him. But this point of order I regard as well taken——

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I am ready to give the information about all these cases.

Mr. KASSON. The point of order I say is well taken; that this amendment changes the entire character of the resolution from one having privilege to one that has no privilege now.

Let us get the necessary information and then if there be any advantage to be gained and it is in our power to do so, I am willing to instruct the President; but not to vote for a resolution for mere buncombe, a resolution that amounts to nothing. Therefore I reserve further points of order for the present, and desire to make a motion to recommit, unless the Chair rules that the point of order made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. POUND] is well taken, as I regard it to be.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is one covering a matter which is hardly competent to be introduced as an original House resolution. It is perhaps unnecessary for the Chair to decide whether it is within the power of either House of Congress by resolution to instruct the President as to his duty. The Chair would be inclined to think that would not be within the power of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. That is for the House to determine, not for the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not called upon to decide that question, and only refers to it incidentally in determining whether this amendment is in order to a resolution of inquiry which has certain privileges under the rules of the House. The amendment proposed is to change the whole character of the pending resolution, which is a simple resolution of inquiry, and make it a resolution of instruction to the President of the United States. The Chair thinks it is not germane and not in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I want to speak on the original resolution.

Mr. COX, of New York. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. POUND. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. REAGAN. Let the resolution and amendment be again read.

The resolution and amendment were read.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that his decision appeared to be based upon the use of the word "instructed" in my amendment. The amendment has been read and, as gentlemen will observe, contains the word "requested." I do not propose to instruct the President.

Mr. POUND. That does not change the character of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. POUND,] to lay upon the table the appeal of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] from the decision of the Chair.

The motion of Mr. POUND was agreed to, upon a division—ayes 83, noes 53.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I wish now to make a few remarks upon the resolution before the House.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I am somewhat astonished at this effort to lay such a resolution upon the table.

Mr. POUND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POUND. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The resolution reported back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CRAPO. Is that debatable?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CRAPO. Does it not go to the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs for consideration. It is a privileged resolution, and the House has been considering it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I shall not occupy the time of the House at any length. I was somewhat astonished to see the effort made here to lay this resolution on the table, but I trust I shall not say anything unkind to any gentleman on either side of the House.

If there is any man on this side of the House or on the other who declares himself, as the vote against this resolution would seem to do, as caring nothing whatever whether an American citizen lies in loathsome jails until he loses his health and his eyesight, as is the case with one of these prisoners now in British bastiles, if there is any gentleman here with a drop of blood in his heart which has come down from Bunker Hill or Monmouth or Yorktown, I want to see him rise in his place and say that he knowingly votes to lay this resolution on the table.

These men, Mr. Speaker, are equal to you, or to me, or to Governor Cornell, or to any other man—superior to some of us who did not go to the field of battle where hard fighting was to be done, but kept away from musket-balls and bayonet charges—these men now in prison, one of them at least and for aught I know more, faced the enemy, a gallant enemy, an enemy worthy of their steel, upon many a battle-field, and fought for your country and for your Union. Yet they are now lying and rotting in jail, sick and dying, while here in this House there are men no better than they, and not so good, who are willing to lay a resolution of this kind on the table and let these men linger in confinement for another twelvemonth, as they have already lingered for twelve months past. Is this Americanism? Is this the spirit of your flag? Is there any American blood in the heart of any man on this floor who can witness this without indignation, without the blood rushing to his head, without raising his arm to strike the man who would dare to vote to lay such a resolution as this on the table, and to say that he will not inquire about these Americans suffering in prison unjustly and without accusation of crime preferred against them?

I am sorry to have heard the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] not only upon this morning but upon other occasions, fling his anathemas and curses and ridicule upon this subject. I have been sorry to hear him.

Mr. ROBESON made a movement, as if to rise.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. No, I will not be interrupted, Mr. Speaker. If the gentleman wishes by and by to make a speech I will hear him and I will respond to him, but not now. I say I regret to have seen the gentleman from New Jersey opposing this resolution in all its phases and at all the steps taken to have this subject brought before the House. I regret to have heard him say to-day that we had no right to call upon the Attorney-General in respectful terms for an opinion upon an important and proper question.

I have long been acquainted with the present Attorney-General of the United States. Though I have not yet called upon him to pay my respects, I am going to do so. But when the gentleman from New Jersey becomes the custodian of his honor I demur. I do not care whether the Attorney-General is Daniel Webster, or William M. Evarts, or any other illustrious man, he is our servant; and we command him to answer this question. We request the President, in such a case, through respect for his high office, but the members of the Cabinet are our servants and they must answer. If any one of them refused I would move to impeach him. "Upon what meat do these our Cæsars feed?" Do we not call upon the Secretary of State, of the Treasury, and other Cabinet officers for information? Are they not paid by the appropriations which we vote? Yet the gentleman from New Jersey seems to place them above the people's Representatives, and introduces into this American Congress the spirit of aristocracy and monarchy and æstheticism. When the long-legged, long-haired æsthetic Wilde Irishman came to this city he was escorted by the gentleman from New Jersey into the grand room where he was to be worshiped. He was dressed, we are told, in knee-breeches and other æsthetic belongings. I do not know how the gentleman from New Jersey was dressed, but he acted as a kind of usher; and I think that is his proper vocation—to escort æsthetes, and not to be interfering with measures proposed on this floor to rescue our American citizens from loathsome jails. I wish, sir—it is the only hope I have of the conversion of the gentleman from New Jersey—I wish he were in the place of Mr. O'Connor; and probably this House would not be so abused by his opposition to this measure.

I have heard the growl of the British lion; I have heard the crunching of the bones of American citizens beneath his paw; I have heard the chains clanking upon the limbs of those glorious citizens, one of whom at least fought upon our battle-fields; and I have looked around, I have looked at the gentleman from New Jersey, to see if there was any hope of salvation for these men. I wanted to know whether there was an eagle around. I looked to see what kind of birds they were that were surrounding the gentleman from New Jersey, and there was not an eagle among them; they were all cormorants.

Sir, when I was addressing this House once before, and was under the impression that my time was extended for a few minutes, I begged the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] that he would give me the floor for only two or three minutes to finish a sentence, in the middle of which I was interrupted, so that the speech I was making might not appear trifling by the ending of it. Had I had those two or three minutes to finish it it would have relieved me from an awkward ending. I appealed to the gentleman from Indiana, who reported this measure to-day, for two minutes. He refused me that favor; but I do not condemn him utterly, because he had the good sense to yield the floor to my friend from New York, [Mr. COX,] who spoke afterward. I have nothing more to say to the gentleman from Indiana, although his course on that occasion was unkind and uncourteous. I have been kept down in this House, repressed, sat upon. Some of those who undertook to sit upon me were too heavy, and I will not have them press upon me. But I have been repressed here, and denied the few minutes to explain the position which I occupied and to finish the sentence, at least, in the middle of which I was interrupted by the expiration of my time, which I thought had been extended.

My good friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] belongs to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Would he want the schoolmaster to go visiting them to instruct them upon what is going on? Everybody except that committee knows that American citizens are in jail; that they are confined without any charge being made against them; yet my friend from Iowa says that he does not know anything of the kind.

Mr. KASSON. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I say one word?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. I remarked that I did not know the names of the other persons, because no other name was mentioned. The facts of the other cases I did not know. I avail myself of my friend's courtesy to say further that the case of O'Connor was acted upon during my absence from the committee; but, as I understand, the opposition to the resolution arose solely from the fact that this case was believed to be included with other cases in the resolution already adopted calling for information. If not, let me say to my friend that I will heartily co-operate with him to get any information which will in any way help American citizens imprisoned without crime in England, Ireland, or any other country of the world; and so will all this side of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Do not say "all;" I am afraid that is going too far. I know that my friend from Iowa, whom I had the pleasure of meeting on this floor fourteen years ago, will not accuse me of saying an unkind word in regard to him. But I think it a lamentable fact that when every laborer in this country knows the names of those men, the Committee on Foreign Affairs (I was on that committee when I was here, I am not on it now) is the only body in this country whose members are not posted upon this subject. Mr. D. H. O'Connor, a citizen of Baltimore, is in jail, having committed no crime, any more than you, Mr. Speaker, if you went over and were thrown in jail, or Governor Cornell of the State of New York. He is left there, and what are we doing for him? And Mr. McSweeny, of California, who, I suppose, my illustrious friend from San Francisco [Mr. ROSECRANS] knows; Mr. McSweeny, whose son has written a letter begging of me to get this House to call attention to his father being in Dundalk jail, with a paper of naturalization, with an American eagle, not one of the cormorant character, but one of the American eagles on the paper he holds and lifting it aloft and showing it to the tyrannical despots who are crushing the hearts out of American citizens in their bastiles, and yet they pay no attention to it, no more, sir, than if it were a crow or a cormorant. Mr. McSweeny's son is largely engaged in business in San Francisco, and, as I have said, I have a letter from him asking that something be done in securing his release from unmerited imprisonment.

And there, too, is Michael Hart, of Lawrence, Massachusetts.

You Massachusetts men! here is one of your citizens from Lawrence in jail, pining in prison, who cannot be attended to, and who, when some friend makes a movement that is perfectly proper, looking toward his release, that movement is met by a report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs that the resolution in his behalf shall be laid upon the table and that he shall be held in jail indefinitely.

I say here, sir, in my place that there is no country, ancient or modern, civilized or barbarian, white or black, no government, however despotic, ever ruled with an iron hand so terrible and so tyrannical as that by which England to-day is crushing the life out of her own subjects and exercising the same control over your citizens with nobody here to proffer a drop of water to their parching lips. None here, sir, to offer a drop of consolation to that Massachusetts man from Lawrence! Could you not, at least, send some consolation over to your own citizen, you men of Massachusetts, to cool his brain which is burning with indignation that there is no country to stand by him and to ask whether there is any accusation of crime against him, that he may be released if accused or found guilty of no crime.

I complain of my treatment here, and I have reason to do so. I have already mentioned that I took my seat thirty-eight years ago in this House as a correspondent of the press. I had been acquainted with the illustrious men who have occupied the old Whig side in the adjoining Hall and the Republican side since, and I have endeavored to cultivate their good fellowship and kindly feeling. Some even of my own friends here, I regret to say, are hardly willing to let this subject come forward. I do not know why there should be such terror. When I tried to get the floor for a few minutes to say something in behalf of American citizens, I, the oldest member of the press, the oldest journalist here except one now in his eighty-fifth year confined to his house in Fourteenth street, yet, sir, I cannot get the gentlemen, my brethren, up there in the reporters' gallery to report this thing properly. I have been assailed as if I were talking on Ireland when I have only been denouncing the unjust and illegal imprisonment of American citizens. But I do not care whether it is Ireland or Africa in which they are imprisoned, my sympathy goes after the American citizen. I have said nothing and I wish to say nothing about Ireland, but I have been represented as if I had been spending my time and the time of this House in talking of Ireland, when, as you all know, the thing I am talking about is the sanctity of American citizenship.

Now, sir, there is no subject which can come before this Congress, whether apportionment, appropriation, or tariff, comparable with this great question of protection to American citizens. If you make it a party question I do not—I would scorn to do it. But if you make it a party question I tell you there will not be a dozen of men who oppose it that can come back to this House from the districts where that is made the issue. I have several letters from the district of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] now vanishing in the distance, [laughter,] remonstrating against the imprisonment of our citizens and begging us to take some effective measures for their release.

As I have said, I have been assailed in the New York Times and New York Tribune. I tried to make an explanation in reply to these attacks before the House, the other day, and one of my own party would not give me the floor for two or three minutes, which was all I asked. More papers assailed me in language they thought funny and sarcastic. I tried to get a few minutes to reply, but could not. It is now too late. Other papers followed assailing me in exactly the same language in which I was assailed fourteen years ago when I was contending for American citizens confined in foreign prisons. I then contended in behalf of a hundred American citizens confined in British and Prussian jails. It made no difference to me whether they were in Austrian jails or Prussian jails or English jails. I stood up for the protection of American citizens who were held without charge of crime and demanded their release, and before I left Congress I carried that through, so that the three great nations of the world, the United States, England, and Prussia or Germany, declared that American naturalized citizens should have the same protection as those of native birth.

And now, sir, I have noticed that the gentleman from Indiana, the other day, contended that the Republican party carried through that measure—that law of 1868. I raised my voice above the din, and stated that I myself had brought that measure in, and that I had carried it through.

I was speaking to this House when that measure was first presented in 1868, and could not get the attention of the members of the House of either side for it until I moved to impeach the minister of the United States, Charles Francis Adams, at the Court of St. James. That was the inception of this measure. After a long time, some six or eight weeks, I finally got the attention of the House called to it, and while at first I could not get a man to second my efforts for the prisoners then in foreign jails, nevertheless when it became known throughout the country, when it became known among the people and protests against the conduct of the House began to come piling in, and petitions by the bushel were sent to Congress, then I have heard upon the floor of this House more than twenty men trying to catch the ear of the Speaker, that they might address the House upon the despised subject.

My illustrious friend from New York, here on my left, [Mr. HEWITT,] tried to answer the gentleman from Indiana the other day and show that it was the war of 1812 that settled that question; and then somebody else, my colleague here from New York also, an eloquent gentleman, undertook to claim that it was Lewis Cass that did it. Mr. Speaker, it was not Lewis Cass, nor was it the war of 1812, nor the Republican party that carried that measure through. It was I, myself, the Representative of the Brooklyn district, and I will prove it if you doubt it. I do not care whom you may appoint on the other side of the House; take any three disinterested members, and let them investigate the matter, and I will prove the truth of this assertion. I say, sir, that I have seen men struggling for the floor in this House and in the Senate when Mr. Sumner and other illustrious Senators were discussing this matter, and we finally got it through both Houses and it was approved by the President, and that is the law now known as the law of 1868. And let me here say, sir, that the remedy is before us. I proceed to state what the law is. I have only mentioned two or three gentlemen who were subjects of this outrage. There are others, several others in the jails whom I might mention, but I have not time now to dwell upon that.

But the law, as I have said, is now very clear. This House, this Congress has instructed the President of the United States as to his duty by my bill of 1868. I did not introduce it; it was the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (General Banks) who introduced it, because he was chairman of the committee; but I was the one who introduced it into the House by speaking and keeping up the agitation in reference to it till I succeeded, not, of course, without the help of both parties in carrying it through. What did this House provide? By a vote in a very full House, where there were only five dissenting voices in the whole body, they provided that, if any American citizen should be put in a foreign jail for words spoken or acts committed in the United States, the President of the United States should seize the first Englishman who came along and keep him as a hostage in jail until our citizen was released. When this measure went to the Senate and was there under discussion, Senator Sumner denounced that portion of it as organized barbarism, or something of that kind; and it was modified so that the President was instructed in the event of any American being unjustly lodged in jail the President should demand his immediate release, and that being refused, the President should take all steps short of an absolute declaration of war to secure his release, and that he should immediately report the fact to Congress, that the Congress might declare war.

I am ready now for that resolution. The committee is ready for it. The House is ready for it. The time is ripe for it. The offense is sufficient justification for it; but I will not now make a motion that we go to war on it.

I have been assailed, sir, because, as alleged, I was going over to London to batter down that great city. Let my squeamish friends on the other side of the House, particularly the gentleman from New Jersey, quiet their apprehensions. There is not going to be any blood shed. I have received a telegram from the Queen by Atlantic cable saying that she is going to release them. [Laughter.] Is that satisfactory to my friend on the other side? That is a little in the way of humor, and I imagine that it is hardly sufficient to call the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey from his seat in such haste. But why, sir, should we not insist upon this thing. How is it that I am assailed with all the abuse of the press because I was going to "batter down the town of London" in behalf of American citizenship? England herself has been through the same ordeal. English citizens were seized and thrown into a bastile, in the emperor's jails in Abyssinia, and England went into the interior with guns mounted upon elephants' backs, demanded their release, bombarded the fortress, killed the monarch, and destroyed the capital. I cited that and said that it was all that the best friends of these persons could suggest.

I did not intend to speak so long, and I intend soon to yield the floor. Will the Chair please inform me how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirty-three minutes remaining.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I shall not occupy the whole of it. I simply said, sir, that if we followed the example of England herself, we would go to England and bring our American citizens home. Is there any reason why we should not demand their release? Is there any reason why we should not assail London? If we could not conquer in one year we could in ten, could we not?

Is there any coward who has hold of an American pen at this time, or controls the American press to a certain extent, who will say we could not take London? Will the New York Times, or the New York Tribune, par nobile fratrum, inform me that we could not take London? Did we not pass the batteries at New Orleans; did we not go up the river defended by braver men than England has now at her command? And did we not take Vicksburgh? I ask any gentleman here of military capacity—and I see some of the most illustrious men, renowned for military achievements, on this floor now—I ask them if it is not easier to take London than it was to take Vicksburgh? I do not want to take London, but if England insists on taking our citizens and insulting us as a nation by putting them without crime in her prisons, why should we not take London? I undertake to seize London at half the expense that it cost you, gentlemen, to take Vicksburgh, and you know it, and yet you are raising some babies' fright as if we were making some great hubbub about something we could not accomplish. We have men brave enough to go where they please and take anything they please. And I tell you when we had to go up the river and take Vicksburgh there were no traitors there among its defenders. But if we go to England we would not be without support. If we had 50,000 bayonets in Ireland to-day we could at once find hands to grasp them for liberty. There would be no difficulty about that.

But I am not going to command an expedition to take London. We shall let London survive. Gentlemen on the other side need not exercise their fears on that subject.

But why is it I have been assailed by these papers and these people as I have been, when I have been simply contending for the honor of America and the sacredness of her citizenship? Is this idea worn out? Is there no Henry Clay or Daniel Webster to come from the tomb and teach you your duty in this respect? Forty years ago I presented to Henry Clay, in the Senate, a petition on the very subject of the measure which I carried through Congress fourteen years ago. And what did he say? Mr. Linn, of Missouri, made some remarks, and Henry Clay's reply was:

If England imprisons any of our citizens unjustly we will let her hear the roar of American artillery.

I cannot give you the page on which his speech is reported, for this thing has been sprung upon me unawares, but at the proper time I can refer you to that speech by Henry Clay. What would he have thought if he had stood in my place now and listened to the vituperation with which I have been assailed—assailed, I may say, with the mingled filth and ferocity of the blood-hound and the polecat [laughter and applause] because I have stood on this floor to contend for the honor of American citizenship and the glory of the American name.

Is the House going to lay this resolution on the table—this resolution reported back by the Committee on Foreign Affairs? Does it mean, will my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] say, you are not to listen at all to the pleading on behalf of these American citizens? If that is the view of the majority of the committee, I implore the House to take different action.

Mr. KASSON. I am so well assured of the sincerity of my honored friend from New York in these matters that before he sits down, which I believe he is about to do, I should like to know from him whether he considers this case covered in the resolution previously reported; for that is the whole point.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will answer that.

Mr. KASSON. If it is not, then without any argument at all we would vote for the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. To what resolution does the gentleman refer?

Mr. KASSON. To the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs on a former occasion.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Oh, that is a humbug from beginning to end.

Mr. KASSON. I am afraid the gentleman mistakes the resolution I refer to. I did not refer to the one proposing an inquiry about J. WARRENKEIFER and Governor Cornell. [Laughter.] I referred to the one that reads in this way——

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. The gentleman may read it, but I hope he will not take up too much time.

Mr. KASSON. The resolution read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to obtain from the British Government a list of all American citizens, naturalized or native-born, under arrest or imprisonment by authority of said government, with a statement of the cause or causes of such arrest and imprisonment, and especially such of said citizens as may have been thus arrested and imprisoned under the suspension of the habeas corpus in Ireland; and, if not incompatible with the public interest, that he communicate such information, when received, to this House, together with all correspondence now on file in the Department of State relating to any existing arrest and imprisonment of citizens as aforesaid.

Now my friend will certainly, with his usual candor, admit that that covers the case of Mr. O'Connor. If, on the other hand, my friend says it does not cover that case, and he wishes to single out Mr. O'Connor from all others and bring the correspondence here, let him say so, and let it pass; it would be of no consequence except that it would duplicate the transmission of correspondence.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will ask my friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] to allow me to answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. BRAGG. Do these speeches come out of the time of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON?]

The SPEAKER. They do.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I will yield a moment to my colleague, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX, of New York. When I introduced into this House a general resolution covering all our citizens confined abroad in these prisons, I was informed by a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that that committeee could not act unless we sent to them specific cases. Am I not right?

Mr. KASSON. I cannot say.

Mr. COX, of New York. My friend from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] will tell you that I am right. I then sent to the committee this case of Mr. O'Connor, a citizen of the United States, so declared by Mr. Blaine in the correspondence, and now the committee report back my specific resolution with the recommendation that it be laid on the table, claiming that the general resolution covers this one.

Now, I propose that this specific case shall not be laid on the table, but that we shall give it what emphasis the House can give it, and as I thought the Committee on Foreign Affairs wanted to have done. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will now understand just our dilemma. First the Committee on Foreign Affairs says that my general resolution is not adequate for their action. Then I sent them this specific case, and they report it back to be tabled, saying that the general resolution covers the whole ground.

Mr. KASSON. I do not know that I quite understand the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] I do not understand that the Foreign Affairs Committee ever said that we could not call for existing correspondence, that we could not call for a list of names.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes; but they report back this specific case and ask that it be laid on the table. Of course, the greater might include the less, but the less comes up more prominent when individualized.

Mr. KASSON. I say frankly to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that personally I have not the slightest objection to this resolution. I only want to say that while not in the committee when this report was ordered, I know that the reason for the report is that it but duplicates a call already made. I will say, however, that if the gentleman from New York desires specific information on this case first, I see no possible objection to it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I think I can say——

Mr. ORTH. Allow me a moment.

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. ORTH. The reason why the Committee on Foreign Affairs made the report that this resolution be laid upon the table was, and I so informed my friend from New York the other day——

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes; you did.

Mr. ORTH. The reason was because the O'Connor case is embraced in the general resolution which passed this House on the 31st of January. Now we have no objection, if this House desires, to duplicate replies from the Executive Departments by passing this resolution. Any one who will read the resolution passed by this House on the 31st of January will see that it embraces not only the O'Connor case but the case of every American citizen imprisoned at the time that resolution was passed.

Mr. COX, of New York. But does not my friend from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] know that this resolution does no harm?

Mr. ORTH. The only harm is that it is a duplicate call.

Mr. COX, of New York. With the indulgence of my friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] I will trespass upon the time of the House two or three minutes. I have before me here a statement of the case of this Mr. O'Connor. He is a reputable and respectable citizen of Baltimore; a man of wealth, of standing, and of business capacity. The arrest and imprisonment of Mr. D. H. O'Connor are peculiarly painful. He is a favorite in the city of Baltimore. He had been an active and successful business man, of well-earned wealth and standing. For ten years he lived in Baltimore, and by his unwearied industry, by overwork and exposure, he lost his health. Three years ago he went to Europe for its benefit, and becoming better, opened an extensive mercantile business in Cork. He was residing in Ireland where his business called him, and happened to be the treasurer of one of these societies for the alleviation of rent. He was arrested and placed in jail, and removed from one jail to another, in a country where every single guarantee of personal liberty has been wiped out by the coercion act and the suspension of habeas corpus. If this arrest be justified, then American citizens can be deprived of liberty with impunity, his business hindered, and his person dishonored. His case was presented to the Department by Mayor Whyte—to Mr. Secretary Blaine. The statement I have from a Baltimore journal:

DEAR SIR: Permit me to present to your kind attention Mr. P. C. O'Connor, of this city, who desires to see you relative to his brother, a citizen of this country, who is under arrest in Ireland. I commend him as a gentleman of honor, character, and intelligence.

With kind regards, very sincerely yours,

WM. PINKNEY WHYTE,
Mayor of Baltimore.

SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. P. C. O'Connor, the brother of the prisoner, in presenting the case to Mr. Blaine, gave documentary proof of citizenship, related the facts attending his brother's going to Ireland, his ill health, business transactions, &c., and, laboring under a very natural and righteous indignation, said there was no honor or advantage in being a citizen of this great Republic if its Government allows her citizens to be cast into British dungeons and held there indefinitely without even knowing the cause of arrest, denied a trial, and treated as the veriest felon.

The following letter gives Mr. Blaine's views on the subject:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 25, 1881.

SIR: Your letter of the 10th instant, inclosing a copy of the record of naturalization of your brother, Dennis H. O'Connor, and also a letter from Hon. William Pinkney Whyte commending you to the Department, has been received.

It appears from this communication that Dennis H. O'Connor is a citizen of the United States by naturalization on the 6th of September, 1875; that he has been domiciled in his native country, in Ireland, for the last four years, and is at present the head of two mercantile firms in that country, one at Charleville, in the county

Cork, and the other at Kilmallock, in the county Limerick, and that he has been recently arrested under the British act of Parliament known as the "peace preservation act," on suspicion, as you allege, of "being in sympathy with the organization known as the 'Irish National Land League,'" and is now in prison. It further appears that his health is impaired and that protracted confinement may aggravate his sufferings and possibly prove fatal to his life.

The case is one of a class that has for many months enlisted the earnest and active sympathy of this Government, and in pursuance of this feeling the minister of the United States at London was early instructed to watch with interest every arrest of an American citizen under the act that might be brought to his notice; to scrutinize each case on its own peculiar merits; to adopt such measures as his judgment might dictate as most likely to secure a prompt inquiry into the charges, and to do everything that could properly be done by him as the representative of this Government to bring about the speedy trial of such of his fellow-citizens as might be so unfortunate as to be denounced under the act of Parliament referred to. Mr. Lowell has pursued these instructions with great energy and sagacity and in full sympathy with the feeling of his Government. The case of your brother, Mr. Dennis H. O'Connor, will take the same course as those which have preceded it, and I can only express the hope that the efforts in his behalf may result in his early liberation. In this connection I must, however, remind you that the act of Parliament under which Mr. O'Connor is held is a law of Great Britain, and it is an elementary principle of public law that in such case the government of that country in the exercise of its varied functions, judicial and executive, administers and interprets the law in question. The right of every government in this respect is absolute and sovereign, and every person who voluntarily brings himself within the jurisdiction of the country, whether permanently or temporarily, is subject to the operation of its laws, whether he be a citizen or a mere resident, so long as in the case of the alien resident no treaty stipulation or principle of international law is contravened by the proceedings taken against him.

In stating this familiar principle, no more is conceded to Great Britain than every country may of right demand, and it is one of the sovereign rights that the Government of the United States has always insisted upon and maintained for itself.

It only remains to acknowledge the receipt of your later note of the 21st instant upon the same subject. While I make the largest allowance for the natural zeal inspired by a brother's distress, I must still attribute the intemperate tone of your language in that communication to your want of correct information in regard to the business of this Department. Its daily correspondence, foreign and domestic, relates to many and varied subjects, some of them embracing questions of pressing public interest. As to each of these subjects deliberate consideration is essential to a proper reply, and it often takes weeks instead of days to make the examination necessary to such reply. Your communication of the 10th instant has received prompt consideration and attention.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

P. C. O'CONNOR, Esq.,
449 East Chase street, Baltimore, Maryland.

[Nat. on Declaration.]

STATE OF MARYLAND,
City of Baltimore, to wit:

At a criminal court of Baltimore, begun and held at the court-house in the city of Baltimore, in and for the city aforesaid, on the second Monday of May, A. D. 1875, for the trial of all felonies and other crimes, offenses, and misdemeanors committed in the said city—present, Hon. Robert Gilmor, judge; Augustus Albert, esq., sheriff; William F. McKewen, clerk—among other were the following proceedings, to wit:

Be it remembered that on the 6th day of September, in the year aforesaid, Dennis H. O'Connor, a native of Ireland, and at present residing in the State of Maryland, appeared in open court here, and applied to be admitted to become a citizen of the United States; and it appearing to the satisfaction of the court here that the said Dennis H. O'Connor had declared on oath, taken in the court of common pleas for Baltimore City, on the 21st day of September, A. D. 1872, two years at least before his admission, that it was bona fide his intention to become a citizen of the United States; and it also appearing to the satisfaction of the court here, upon the testimony of John Barrett, jr., a citizen of the United States, that the said Dennis H. O'Connor hath continued to reside within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States five years at least, and one year at least immediately preceding this application within the State of Maryland; that during the said term of five years he hath conducted himself as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same; and the said Dennis H. O'Connor having declared on oath, taken in open court here, that he will support the Constitution of the United States, and that he doth absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign prince, potentate, State, and sovereignty whatever, and particularly all allegiance and fidelity to the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the court here thereupon admits the said Dennis H. O'Connor to become a citizen of the United States.

WM. F. McKEWEN, Clerk.

In testimony that the foregoing is a true copy taken from the record of proceedings of the court aforesaid, I subscribe my name and affix the seal of the said court to this certificate of naturalization this 13th day of February, A. D. 1882.

[SEAL.] JOHN S. BULLOCK,
Clerk of the Criminal Court of Baltimore.

How, then, can we reach these our citizens? It is now for us to aid the Department in their efforts, for I have here another case where the certificate of naturalization was filed, so acknowledged in the correspondence of our minister in London. I have the warrant upon which that citizen was arrested. I ask gentlemen to examine these papers, for I do not wish in this matter to indulge in mere rhetoric, but to come down to the business which this resolution presents for the consideration of this House. Hence I print the correspondence entire:

LIMERICK PRISON, January 16, 1882.

DEAR MISS: I send you inclosed Mr Lowell's answer to my application for protection. It needs no comment from me. I also inclose you copy of warrant of my arrest, hoping you will send them to some Congressman in America, and give the case publication for the information of American citizens. In addition I wish to state, I went to America in 1850, at the age of sixteen, came back to Ireland in 1875 to recover my health, and resided in the neighborhood of Abbyfeale until arrested under the coercion act. I am now seven months in jail, and from long and close confinement my eye-sight has failed; so that I am unable to read any during eighteen hours in cell. What this is for, I do not know, as I challenge any person in Ireland to prove any crime against me, more than being an American citizen.

I remain, most respectfully, your obliged and faithful servant,

JOHN McENERY,
Suspect, Limerick Prison.

P. S. NOTE.—I have asked Mr. Lowell for a fair and impartial trial.

Miss ANNA PARNELL.

THE LADIES' NATIONAL LAND LEAGUE,
39 Upper Sackville Street, Dublin, January 26, 1882.

DEAR MR. COX: You will see that I am requested by the writer of this, John McEnery, at present confined in Limerick prison, without trial, to send Mr. Lowell's answer to his application for protection to some Congressman, and to have his case published in the American papers. I think that you are the best person I can send the papers to, as you have always shown so much interest in our people and done so much to help us.

I remain, yours, truly,

ANNA PARNELL.

Number II.—44 Victoria, chapter 4. (1881.)

An act for the better protection of person and property in Ireland.

WARRANT TO ARREST.

Whereas by our order, dated the 4th day of March, 1881, and made by and with the advice of the privy council in Ireland, and by virtue of the act made and passed in the forty-fourth year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, intituled "An act for the better protection of person and property in Ireland," and of every power and authority in this behalf, we specified and declared that the hereinafter mentioned part of Ireland, (that is to say,) the County of Limerick, should, from and after the 5th day of March, 1881, be and continue a prescribed district within the meaning and provisions of the said act;

And whereas our said order is still in force:

Now we, the lord lieutenant-general and general governor of Ireland, by virtue of the said act, and of every power and authority in this behalf, do by this our warrant declare John McInerney, of Kilconly, near Abbeyfeale, in the County of Limerick aforesaid, to be reasonably suspected of having, since the 30th day of September, 1880, been guilty as principal of a crime punishable by law, that is to say, unlawfully assembling with others and maliciously assaulting and breaking into a dwelling house, committed in the aforesaid prescribed district, and being an act of violence and tending to interfere with the maintenance of law and order.

And this is to command you to whom this warrant is addressed to arrest the said John McInerney in any part of Ireland, and lodge him in Her Majesty's prison at Limerick, there to be detained during the continuance of the said act, unless sooner discharged or tried by our direction.

Given at Dublin Castle, the 30th day of May, 1881.

COWPER.

To the sub-inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary at Abbeyfeale, in the County of Limerick aforesaid, and his assistants, and to the Governor of Her Majesty's prison at Limerick.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, August 3, 1881.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, inclosing the naturalization papers and passports of John McEnery, a political prisoner in Her Majesty's jail at Limerick.

This is one of a number of cases in which parties desire my intervention upon the allegation that they are American citizens, that they have done nothing contrary to law, and that they desire a speedy trial.

The "coercion act," so called, is an exceptional and arbitrary measure. Its chief object is to enable the authorities to arrest persons whom they suspect of illegal conduct, without being obliged to produce any proof of their guilt. Its very substance and main purpose are to deprive suspected persons of the speedy trial they desire. This law is, of course, contrary to the spirit and foundation principles of both English and American jurisprudence. But it is the law of the land, and it controls all persons domiciled in the proclaimed districts of Ireland, whether they are British subjects or not, and it is manifestly entirely futile to claim that naturalized citizens of the United States should be excepted from its operation.

The only possible case in which it would be proper for me to interfere would be where an American citizen who is in Ireland attending exclusively to his private business, and taking no part whatever in public meetings or political discussions, should be arrested. In such a case it would be proper to appeal to the courtesy of the Government, upon the ground of mistake or misapprehension, and ask for the release of the prisoner. It does not appear, however, that these reasons exist in any of the cases that have so far been brought to my knowledge.

Unless I am instructed to the contrary by the Department of State, I must take this view of my duties, and it is proper that you should give this intimation to the parties interested.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. R. LOWELL.

E. P. BROOKS, Esq., United States Consul at Cork, &c.

Inclosures: Passport of J. McEnery and certificate of McEnery's naturalization.

A true copy of the original on file in this Consulate.

E. P. BROOKS,
United States Consul at Cork.

Let the members read these documents and they will find data strong enough for the resolution which your honored Speaker ruled out of order a few minutes ago.

We do not want any more information so far as the persons whose names I have here are concerned; for by the correspondence of the State Department and the minister at London their naturalization certificates are acknowledged. They are confessed to be citizens of the United States. That they have been arrested during the land troubles in Ireland no one doubts. All forms of law and muniments of freedom were suspended and are held null so far as their personal rights are concerned.

Allow me to say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, returning my thanks to my friend from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] for his courtesy, that this is in no sense a party question. It is connected with the highest prerogatives of citizenship. It is associated with the idea of patriotism. That sentiment is next only to the idea of God. It may not take hold on the unseen world, but the love of our native land and of our adopted home has its peculiar and beautiful sanctity, the sacredness of thinking one thought concerning our Republic—the idem sententiam de republica of Cicero. This controlling idea has been established in this country as well by our Constitution and statutes as by the blood of our citizens, many of them of foreign birth. It is an idea which demands from us, the legislators of America, unpartisan, energetic, and cordial effort to rescue these men from these prisons, or at least to demand for them that they should have a fair trial under the safeguards of law. In the face of a refusal of that we should demand their prompt release, as a part of the best mode known among nations for our peace and dignity among the nations.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I yield the floor for a few minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. MURCH.]

Mr. MURCH. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to consume any time on this question. I leave the discussion of it to abler men. But yesterday I made an ineffectual attempt to get recognition from the Chair that I might ask unanimous consent to have spread upon the record of this House the preamble and resolutions coming from the Parnell Branch of the Land League instituted in my own city. I understood the Speaker to give a tacit consent to recognize me at a certain stage of the proceedings; but instead of doing so he recognized other men with similar propositions, and deferred his recognition of me until a demand for the regular order was made. I now ask to have the Clerk read the preamble and resolutions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas certain citizens of the United States of America, having been arrested on Irish soil, unreasonably and unjustly suspected of being disloyal to the British Government in proceedings of a political character, are now held as prisoners in British dungeons and denied the right of a speedy trial for the offense with which they are charged; and

Whereas it is the imperative duty of the Government of the United States to give protection to its citizens in foreign lands to the fullest extent of its power under the laws of nations: Therefore,

Resolved, That we, as citizens of the United States, earnestly request our representatives in Congress assembled to use their best efforts in securing such legislation as will give our citizens a speedy trial or procure for them a release from imprisonment.

Adopted by the Parnell Branch of the Irish National Land League.

GEO. L. SNOW,
Recording Secretary.

ROCKLAND, MAINE, February 3, 1882.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. In addition to the answer which my friend from New York [Mr. COX] has given to my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] I will say that I have used strong language with reference to this matter because on the first day or two of the session I tried unsuccessfully to get the floor to present a resolution on this subject. I could not get the ear of the House at that time; but through the Associated Press, which extends a little beyond our jurisdiction, I obtained the publicity which was refused to my proposition here. The resolution when finally presented and referred lay in the Committee on Foreign Affairs for eight or ten weeks, notwithstanding your rule is positive that such a resolution shall be reported in eight days. It has now gone to the executive department; and there, I prophesy, it will lie until some of our citizens die in jail.

Now, I have pronounced all that matter a humbug. The law of the United States, which is higher than the President—a law signed by the predecessor of the present Executive—demands that whenever information reaches the executive department that any American citizen is thrown into jail the President shall immediately demand his release. The President knows that there are American citizens in jail without trial. It is his duty under the law to demand the immediate release of every such citizen or his speedy trial. That is all we ask.

The vaporings of the press in regard to my position are not worth noticing. I have demanded no such thing as that we shall sustain our citizens in the violation of law. I have only said that these men have not violated the law. The law imperatively requires—and the President is subordinate to the law—that the President shall make this demand in every way short of war; and if the demand is not listened to shall bring the matter instantly before Congress that we may declare war.

I have made a calculation while sitting here at my desk that in the way we are trying to get these men out of prison under the system adopted here it would take one thousand years to get a fly out of a molasses cup. [Laughter.]

The law requires that the President demand the instant release of these men, and if they are not released then we should call up Henry Clay's immortal memory from the tomb, and, to quote his phrase, "let Great Britain hear the roar of American artillery."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that I have made myself somewhat offensive upon this floor in the earnestness with which I have treated this subject.

If any man thinks that I have shown too much earnestness, let him speak, "for him have I offended." If I have too warmly proclaimed our duty in this matter, gentlemen should remember that "something must be pardoned to the spirit of liberty." I know that the American people are with me. My friend from New Jersey dared to tell me the other day that I did not understand the principles of liberty and law. I do not understand them as he does, and I do not want to. I was his teacher when he was a boy—and he was not a bright boy either—when he was studying in Judge Hornblower's office in Newark, New Jersey. He was my boy, and was a very dull boy, but I did the best I could for him. I know more now on a question of this kind than he does. Such men as Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, Abraham Lincoln, and others have read my letters and drawn from them their inspiration in regard to the American doctrine, as I can prove by letters that I now have in my possession.

But, as I have said, this thing cannot be put down. Whether you vote to table this resolution is a matter of indifference to me. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church;" the sufferings of these prisoners will be the seed of Democracy. I care not what you may do, they are bound to be released; and when we bring them home we will not salute the British flag as was done recently at Yorktown. All the dignity and grace of my friend from New Jersey, leading the Irish chief of the æsthetes of the world into a public ball-room or lecture-room, cannot quench the spirit of American liberty. You may try to override that great conviction which believes in Democracy and does not believe in monarchy. You may try to bridle the tongue of men who plead for the sanctity of American citizenship, but everywhere over this land the spirit of liberty, the hatred of monarchy, the love of democratic republicanism are unalterably fixed in the American heart, and control every State. That spirit of liberty is all-powerful and all-pervading——

'Tis where Ontario's billow, like ocean surge, is curled;
Where strong Niagara's thunders wake the echo of the world;
Where red Missouri bringeth rich tributes from the West,
And Rappahannock sweetly sleeps on green Virginia's breast.

Old Massachusetts wears it within her lordly crown,
And broad Ohio bears it 'mid all her young renown;
Connecticut still wreathes it where her quiet foliage waves,
And bold Kentucky breathes it through all her ancient caves.

Mr. ROBESON. I am not ashamed, Mr. Speaker, of the distinction, if it be a distinction, of being the target for the folly of every crank in this House. [Laughter.] It is the part of the duty of a man who honestly and earnestly endeavored to give a right direction to legislation here to submit himself to the censure of fools and the vituperation of demagogues, and I do not regret that I can claim that proud distinction before the American people.

This House knows that I have never interfered with the gentleman in his proposition, nor even opposed this or any other measure looking to the same end, when properly before us. But I have objected to his consuming time when he was out of order, and I have been constrained to make some legal points against him when he sought to exhibit his incoherent folly in defiance of the principles of ordinary government and legislation as well as to the obstruction of business. But I never sat down on him, I assure the House I never did. I was restrained from that because I knew his wind would come constantly without pressure. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has vouched for the sincerity of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.] I trust that was done only in the courtesy of debate, because if the gentleman from New York was sincere, this House and the country will agree with me that we must summon medical experts before we permit him further to claim the right to interfere with the legislation of this country. The question before us will be one of sincerity on one side and folly on the other. If he is sincere I fear that the expert judgment would be against him. If he be not, he is only foolish and mendacious, because he knows very well, and knew when he said, if he was in his senses—and I may as well say it now—that he never taught me anything, at any time or in any way.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Oh, no; you were too stupid. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. He knows well that I never was a student of his at any time or in any relation, nor do I know any respectable country community that would receive him as a country school-master. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Let me say——

Mr. ROBESON. I decline now to be interruped.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I can prove I taught you.

Mr. ROBESON. No, never; not one word.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. That is, what you could learn.

Mr. ROBESON. No, never.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Do you remember the Express Lunch in the basement?

Mr. ROBESON. I may have looked into the windows of a saloon when I was a law student in Newark and seen the gentleman practicing at the bar, and he may have thought that I was going to learn by example, but it was not so. [Laughter.] So much for the gentleman's unprovoked attack upon me.

The point of order I made against the gentleman's resolution was this, and I appeal to the judgment of the House and every lawyer within the sound of my voice for the correctness of the position which I took: I said it was not competent for this House to call upon the Attorney-General of the United States to advise this House by giving his opinion on any hypothetical case. I said we might ask him to account for his acts or we might call on him for information, but that he is only the adviser of the Executive; that this House assumes to stand above the advice of Attorneys-General in the execution of its legislative duties, and even to disregard, if need be, in the discharge of constitutional obligations, the decision of the highest legal tribunals of this land. That was a good point of order, although possibly it was made too late.

And now I desire to say another thing to the gentleman from New York. He professes to be a special friend of Irishmen. I profess to be their friend also. I was born of Irish blood myself and my ancestor fought in the great struggle against English power on this continent, from Bunker Hill to Yorktown. He did not content himself with barren declamation on the floor of any debating assembly, and think by that means he could right the wrongs of his fellow-countrymen or repress the arrogance of that great power.

And I have still another suggestion to make to the gentleman——

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. You need not give it.

Mr. ROBESON. And to the advocates of Irish freedom from the safe distance of 3,000 miles. It is embodied in a line of one of their poets. "Hereditary foeman."

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. "Bondsmen;" you do not quote it correctly.

Mr. ROBESON. "Know ye not, who would be free, themselves must strike the blow."

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. The gentleman did not quote it correctly.

Mr. ROBESON. Gentlemen should realize that Irish freedom cannot be achieved from the floor of the American Congress by interrupting its proceedings with the roar of demogogical orations. England will pass such by as the "idle wind" which she regards not. It is a maxim of political philosophy "that those nations enlarge their liberty that shorten their weapons," and a maxim illustrated all along the line of history down to the present day. Witness on the one side the Roman gladius and the American bowie knife, and on the other the long lance of the Polish exile, and the long tongue of the Irish patriot. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I profess to be a friend of Irishmen, and rejoice that I am a representative in part of a great Government which opens a continent with its resources to every honest and enterprising Irishman; which invites to its bosom the liberty-loving of every language and of every land. We have among us thousands, tens of thousands of Irishmen who, with their descendants, make an element of domination and control, not only in every commercial enterprise, but in every governmental progress. And that man is the true friend of Ireland who contributes his power to good government; to liberal and progressive enactments; to aid the advancement of those great principles of freedom and justice and the rights of man upon which this great Republic is founded. I cannot understand how a man who professes to be a friend of the oppressed anywhere can come into the halls of Congress and set himself up as an obstacle to those ideas which the great party of freedom and progress illustrates in its principles, and which, when the gentleman does not interrupt us by his folly, we carry out in our measures.

So much for this question, Mr. Speaker. To this particular resolution now before us, I have no objection. I understand it to be the duty of the Executive to inquire carefully and strictly wherever an American citizen, whether native-born or naturalized—one is no better than the other in that regard, though from the gentleman's remarks I should not think so—to inquire strictly as to the cause of the imprisonment and detention, and to take every measure in his power, under the law, to procure a proper adjustment of the question. If his power does not extend to it, then it is his duty to report the proceedings to the American Congress for such action as they may see fit to take, sustained by the temper of the American people.

Now, sir, several days ago, on the last of January, this House passed a resolution covering exactly this case with others. Why is it, then, that the gentleman wants this House to pass this special resolution in behalf of Mr. O'Connor? Does he wish to keep the others in prison while he directs special attention to Mr. O'Connor's case? The previous action of the House covers this case with the others, and I think, for one, that when the American Congress is engaged in formulating, preparing, and pressing for passage the apportionment bill which is to decide the representation of this country for the next ten years, and have been for days engaged upon it; while Legislatures wait for our action, and the people are impatient for its result—I think it is not good government, it is not patriotic toward free America, it is not patriotic to oppressed Ireland, to interpose a day of demagogism in the progress of American legislation.

Mr. Speaker, as to this question as it stands here, it matters little whether this resolution be passed or not. If it has already been decided in substance, then it is not necessary to pass it again. If it has not been passed, we are all in favor of it, though it is only surplusage.

I therefore, before taking my seat, yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] for the purpose of moving the previous question on this matter, in order that we may have an end of this folly.

Mr. ORTH rose.

Mr. MURCH. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. MURCH. I have risen to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURCH. I make the point of order that the language of the gentleman from New Jersey is not in order. I object to the gentleman from New Jersey designating every man who has spoken upon this side of this subject as a demogogue. That language is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. He should have called him to order at the time, as provided by the rules.

Mr. MURCH. I am making a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rose under the pretense that he desired to make a point of order, and then proceeded to make a speech.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that it is very anxious to treat everybody very fairly, but gentlemen have no right to attempt to get the floor under the pretense that they desire to make a point of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. Does the Chair address that language to me?

The SPEAKER. The Chair addresses that language to the gentleman who rose and attempted to debate the question under the claim of a point of order, and not to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. I claim the right, under the vote of the House which has just been taken, to control this resolution which comes from the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House, because the gentleman lost control of it by that vote. My point of order is that it is under my control now and is my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey who had the floor yielded the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, as he had the right to do.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yielded the floor to call the previous question, which would give him control of the subject for an hour longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York did not assume to take the floor for the purpose of controlling the resolution. But another gentleman did, and he acquiesced in that. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] is recognized.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] expressly stated he did not want to speak afterward.

Mr. COX, of New York. But after the extraordinary speech of the gentleman from New Jersey, I would have liked to put in a few solid remarks. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] is recognized.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise to a point of order, and I do not make it as a pretext for covering something else. I am assured by the honorable ex-Speaker, who has ruled on these matters before, and with intelligence, that by the order of the House, and in accordance with the ordinary mode of ruling by the Chair, I am now the representative of the majority of the House on this proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. I will state for myself, what I have just said to the gentleman from New York, that the Foreign Affairs Committee came in here and made a report——

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a point of order. Is there anything before this House?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. RANDALL. I am before it. The Foreign Affairs Committee, by a vote of the House, lost control of the subject, and the gentleman from New York——

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is now on the floor on a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I was saying that the Foreign Affairs Committee lost control of the subject. The gentleman from New York, as representing the voice of the majority, was recognized to offer an amendment. It is not therefore in order for the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] to yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] during the time he has for debate, so as to take from the gentleman from New York control of the subject which the House has placed in his care by its vote.

Now I want to cite a case in point. In a controversy between the present Speaker himself when on the floor and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Butler, in the Forty-fifth Congress, under my ruling the present Speaker was recognized on his proposition having prevailed against the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the two cases are not the same in any sense. The Chair in that case very properly, as the Chair would now rule in a like case, ruled, after the House refused to order the previous question, that the gentleman who then had the floor on a counter proposition was entitled to recognition. In this case the gentleman from New York, without having any instrumentality in the action of the House more than any other gentleman who opposed the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, took the floor and offered an amendment, which was ruled out of order, and the ruling of the Chair was sustained in effect by the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] then yielded all the right he had.

Mr. RANDALL. He yielded the right of debate.

The SPEAKER. He yielded all the right he had at that time by retaining his seat and allowing another gentleman to take the floor for debate. Since that time no affirmative act has been done on either side of this question in the way of amendment. The Chair, after the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was voted down, submitted, without any suggestion from any gentleman, the resolution to the House, and said it was before the House for consideration. Now the gentleman from New Jersey, speaking in his own right, having occupied but a portion of his time, yields the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, who proposes to move the previous question on the resolution, as to which there has been no action taken at all by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Foreign Affairs recommended that the resolution be laid on the table, and the House voted that proposition down.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a point of order.
Mr. RANDALL. I am on the floor.
Mr. ROBESON. I call the gentleman from Pennsylvania to order.
Mr. RANDALL. State your point of order.
Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not Speaker of the House, though he seems unable to remember that fact.
Mr. RANDALL. I am a member of the House and a member in good standing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]
Mr. ROBESON. And so am I. I rise to make this point of order: the Chair has decided the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] has the floor. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] appeal from that decision? If not there is no point of order pending.
Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from New Jersey held the floor for debate and could not yield the floor, as he stated, to the gentleman from Indiana, representing the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who were outvoted, for the purpose of demanding the previous question. That power comes back to the majority of this House on this particular question. If there is any well settled parliamentary principle never varied from it is this.
Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of order. Has the Chair ruled on the point of order?
The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize no gentleman on any question till gentlemen resume their seats. [After a pause.] The Chair desires to state, it recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to make a point of order. On that point of order the Chair very willingly recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania to make a statement, such as the Chair is always willing to hear from any gentleman on a question that is properly before the House. The Chair was about to state, in view of the relation that this question bears to the House, that no gentleman was entitled as a matter of right to control the resolution. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] did not acquire it under the practice, because he had not antagonized the resolution in any way more than any other gentleman. The gentleman from New York had offered an amendment, which was ruled out of order. Now, the Chair holds that any gentleman, whether from New York or any other State, who could get the floor even for debate might, if he chose, take the opinion of the House on the question as to whether the House should proceed to a vote upon this proposition by demanding the previous question.
Mr. BLACKBURN. In all deference to the Chair, before its final decision on the point of order shall be made, which point was made by the gentleman from New York, I desire to say just one word.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.
Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the House to look back over the number of years that I have been a member of this House, and the occupant of the chair has been here nearly as long. During the whole of that time until the present session this side has been in the majority and held control.

I ask you to find me, if it be possible, a single instance in which a committee of this House ever brought a report into this House, and was beaten by a vote of the House upon its own report, and the occupant of the chair, be he who he might, did not at once pass the control of the measure to the other side.

Now, it will not be questioned that a committee of this House, having no more rights in its place than any other committee of this House, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, came in with a report proposing to lay upon the table a resolution which had been referred to it for consideration. A test vote of the House was had, and that committee went down—was repudiated to that extent by the vote of the House.

Now, certainly it will not be disputed by the Chair, in the light of the chain of precedents that has been unbroken in my short service here, that the rightful control of this matter passed at once from the majority to the minority side of the House, so far as its organization is concerned, but from the minority to the majority side in strength of vote, as tested on this measure.

Now, it is singular to me, and I say it with all deference to the Speaker, that he can reach a conclusion in this matter so different from the position I have taken. I do not believe that in the seven years past an instance can be found where the friends of a measure, where the gentleman himself reporting it, after it had been beaten by a vote of the House, has been allowed to resume control of it and ask the previous question upon it.
Mr. COX, of New York. May I be allowed to make a remark personal to myself?
The SPEAKER. Certainly.
Mr. COX, of New York. I understood the Chair to say that "the gentleman from New York," meaning myself, did not take the floor to debate this resolution.
The SPEAKER. The Chair stated, or intended to state, that the gentleman from New York did not take the floor to control the resolution.
Mr. COX, of New York. In response to that remark of the Chair, the "gentleman from New York" would beg to say that he does not think it necessary that a gentleman should be upon the floor making a great noise and making speeches in order to have control of a resolution of which he is the author, especially when the House has already indicated that they disagreed with the recommendation of the committee on that resolution.

I have been here nearly four times as long as my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] and I never yet saw the House express its opinion upon a measure without the party in whose favor the expression was made being allowed the right to control that measure, more especially if he was the author of it.

But the ruling of the Chair now is, and I say it with the greatest respect to my friend, the Speaker, that he will turn the control of this measure, not for debate, but for the ordering of the previous question, which will cut off debate, over to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] for the express purpose of calling the previous question, and thereby cutting off my control over my own resolution, while I am endeavoring to bring it to the favorable consideration of the House against the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will state briefly that it agrees entirely with what has so frequently been said here, that where a committee, or where a gentleman controlling a measure, after reporting it loses the control of it by an adverse vote of the House, then the other side is entitled to be first recognized to control it. But it does not follow that the other side is at liberty to go into general debate, and that the gentleman who might be entitled to control the measure can take it and yield the floor to others, thereby cutting off every other member of the House from doing that which he might otherwise do, that is, demand the previous question.
Mr. RANDALL. A word right there.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] had the floor. He debated the resolution. He then took his seat and yielded the floor, and did not assume to control this matter at all.
Mr. COX, of New York. I debated it in the time of my colleague from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.]
The SPEAKER. Now, in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]——
Mr. RANDALL. A word now.
The SPEAKER. In a moment. The Chair is perfectly familiar with the practice in the House since he has been a member, and knows many instances where amendments have by a vote of the House been put upon measures, which amendments were entirely antagonistic to the principal subject of the measure; and yet the occupant of the chair has always held that the person reporting that measure still was entitled to control it.
Mr. BLACKBURN. Just one moment.
The SPEAKER. Certainly.
Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not antagonize that view of the Chair; I recognize it as entirely correct and fair. What I said was this, that there was no instance during the six years past where a committee had brought a report into this House and been beaten on their report, that the control of the measure did not pass to the other side.
The SPEAKER. The control of the measure did pass in this instance and a gentleman of the opposition was recognized, and he debated the question and took his seat. Other gentlemen in opposition spoke and took their seats. And other gentlemen on the other side, all of them in favor of the resolution as an original proposition, so far as the Chair could learn from listening to their remarks, took the floor and spoke. And the Chair supposed that if a gentleman having the floor chose to yield to any member here, regardless of whether he was on the committee or not, he might yield to him for the purpose of making any motion then in order under the rules.
Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say that no such condition of things in reference to this matter exists as has just been stated by the Chair.
The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot enter into any colloquy with the gentleman about that.
Mr. RANDALL. I say so respectfully to the Chair, for I do not mean to be offensive in any degree. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] yielded an hour to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] in a spirit of fair play, in order that the other side might be heard. But he did not in any degree yield any right which the majority of the House placed in his hands.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] did not take the floor in the first instance at all, but allowed the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] to take the floor in his stead, which the Chair understood to be in accordance with his wish.
Mr. CALKINS. I want to cite—because the precedents of this House have been challenged—I want to cite in the hearing of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] and of the ex-Speaker of the House a precedent in the last Congress almost analogous to the present case. It was in the contested-election case of Yocum vs. Curtin, in which General Weaver, who had made a minority report, obtained the floor and moved the previous question; and the Speaker at that time held that he had the right to do so. He moved the previous question though he represented the minority, the House sustained the previous question, and the Chair then recognized the chairman of the committee to have the control of the hour after the previous question was ordered.
Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman alluded to by my friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] had made a separate and independent report, and he simply exercised his right under the rules.
The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided to recognize the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.]
Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Indiana in his hour demands the previous question, we shall have something further to say.
Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman from Indiana makes the motion which has been suggested, I would like to ask him whether this resolution was submitted to the full Committee on Foreign Affairs or not?

Mr. ORTH. Yes, sir, of course.

Mr. BLOUNT. I was present and do not remember it, and several other gentlemen do not.

Mr. ORTH. It was submitted at the meeting of the committee last Friday morning.

Mr. BLOUNT. I was present and do not remember it, and I think my friend will find that the minutes of the committee do not show it. That is my understanding.

Mr. HAZELTON. That is a side question.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is not a side question at all. I, as a member on Foreign Affairs, have the right to know whether the full committee has acted upon this matter.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a question of privilege, and I hope the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] my colleague on the committee, will yield to me a moment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. ORTH. For what purpose?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to state.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose I have a right to raise a question of personal privilege, whether the gentleman yields or not.

The SPEAKER. Not to take the gentleman from the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I simply desire to say that I was not present when this resolution was acted on by the committee, and never saw it till it came here to-day.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, I shall detain the House but a very short time upon this proposition; and in answer to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] one of my colleagues on the Foreign Affairs Committee, I wish to state that these two resolutions were referred to a sub-committee having particular charge of this question; and on last Friday morning I, as chairman of the sub-committee, informed the full committee, upon the eve of our adjournment, that these resolutions had been embraced in a prior resolution of the House, and suggested that I should report them and ask that they be laid on the table.

Mr. BLOUNT. May I ask the gentleman if it is not true that the communication made by him on behalf of the sub-committee was after the House was in session, and when the committee was breaking up?

Mr. ORTH. I do not remember as to the particular hour, of course.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend will allow me to say that the minutes of the committee do not show any such report.

Mr. ORTH. That may be; I am not responsible for that.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague on the committee [Mr. WILSON] does not recollect anything of the sort, nor does the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BELMONT.] I do not, of course, impute any unfair dealing on the part of my friend from Indiana, for I know he is incapable of it.

Mr. ORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, so far as the original resolution on this question was concerned, I know that there was not a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs opposed to it—not one; nor do I think that a single gentleman on either side of the House was opposed to it, or any other resolution looking in the same direction.

This House on the 31st of January adopted by a unanimous vote a resolution calling upon the President for information with regard to all American citizens who might be imprisoned in Great Britain up to the time of the adoption of the resolution. I ask the Clerk to read that resolution; and I hope the House will give it attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to obtain a list of all American citizens, naturalized or native-born, under arrest or imprisonment by authority of the British Government, with a statement of the cause or causes of such arrest and imprisonment, and especially such of said citizens as may have been thus arrested and imprisoned under the suspension of the habeas corpus in Ireland; and, if not incompatible with the public interest, that he communicate such information, when received, to this House, together with all correspondence now on file in the Department of State relating to any existing arrest and imprisonment of citizens as aforesaid.

Mr. ORTH. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Foreign Affairs and every member of it felt this general resolution embraced the specific resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Will my friend allow me to ask him to correct that statement, or will he allow me to do it? The minority members of the committee say that they have not considered the resolution reported this morning, and do not remember of its having been before the committee at all.

Mr. ORTH. What is that?

Mr. BLOUNT. The minority members of the committee unite in saying that the report of the O'Connor matter was not considered by the committee at all.

Mr. HAZELTON. Let that come in writing.

Mr. ORTH. The minority of what committee?

Mr. BLOUNT. Of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ORTH. The sub-committee or the general committee?

Mr. BLOUNT. The general committee.

Mr. ORTH. I do not understand that. I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to allude to what took place in the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I have already assured the gentleman from Georgia that on last Friday morning I held those resolutions in my hand, remarking to the Speaker these resolutions I would report to the House, with recommendations that they be laid on the table, because they are embraced in the general resolution the House has already adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I so understand the gentleman, but I wish to say that the minority of the committee did not so understand it.

Mr. ORTH. I cannot help that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this resolution no one has any objection to. If the House wishes to pass it we have no objection. I certainly have none. It is asking simply a second time for information which the House has already requested the President to furnish. I wish to state and the House to understand the resolution now before us asking for information in regard to O'Connor is asking for the same information embraced in the resolution passed on the 31st of January. The House, however, having intimated by a vote this morning they desire the information a second time, I hope the resolution will pass, and I now demand the previous question.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. It is this, that when the resolution was reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which the gentleman from Indiana is chairman, he moved to adopt the report of the committee, which proposed to lay the resolution on the table. Upon that motion on a vote of the House they refused to concur in the motion and decided they would consider the resolution, and therefore in considering it the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] rose——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that he was not recognized to make a speech but to state a point of order.

Mr. HOOKER. I am stating simply the point of order, if the Chair will give me time enough to do it. I cannot state it in a moment, but if you will give me time enough I will do it. I do not wish to debate the resolution. I say the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] then took the floor, the House having voted down the proposition of the committee to lay the resolution on the table, and offered an amendment; and when that amendment was offered the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] rose and addressed the Chair, and the Chair recognized him. For what purpose? For the purpose of debate, the House having said they would consider the resolution. Therefore when the gentleman from New York had concluded his argument, the gentleman from New Jersey took the floor, and took it because the Speaker had decided debate was in order; and yet when the gentleman from New Jersey was concluding his speech, he turned round to the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the committee, and said: I yield to the chairman of the committee for the purpose of moving the previous question; thus attempting by this method to reverse the action of the House, which had declared it would consider the resolution and determine it.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. HOOKER. That the gentleman has not the floor to make his motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COX, of New York, rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi, so far as the point of order is concerned he has been trying to make, it has been already decided. The Chair will also state that if the gentleman from Mississippi or any other gentleman on the floor had been recognized as entitled to the floor on this question generally, the Chair would have recognized that gentleman for the purpose of demanding the previous question. This is a question of right of recognition, not of right to make the motion. Any member, after being recognized generally on a question, may make any motion then in order under the rules.

Mr. HOOKER. I do not wish to debate, but the point of order I make——

The SPEAKER. The point of order of the gentleman from Mississippi is overruled.

Mr. COX, of New York. I rise for the purpose of taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and having it settled by the House. I claim the right under the ordinary custom, usage, and rules of the House to the floor, this being my resolution; and the House having decided against the motion of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, against laying it on the table, I claim the right of the floor to conduct the debate and call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the gentleman has the right to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair on the point of order made by the gentleman from Mississippi; but the Chair wishes to state that the gentleman from New York took the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the House held was not in order. The question now is, shall the judgment of the House be sustained?

Mr. COX, of New York. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the right of the gentleman to appeal.

Mr. COX, of New York. I appeal on the ground of the recognition of the gentleman from Indiana by the Chair as controlling this measure.

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBESON. I wish to ask whether it is not in order for a gentleman speaking in his own right, or to whom the right has been conceded by another member without limitation, to make any motion which is in order under the rules of the House; and when I am on the floor for debate is it not my right, and what rule is there which controverts it, to move the previous question if I choose? And if I do not choose myself to make the motion, have I not the right to yield to another to make the motion, and where is the rule that restricts it?

Mr. RANDALL. The rule that restricts it is the general parliamentary practice which has never been varied from.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. ROBESON. I move to lay that appeal upon the table, and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question before the House. The Chair ruled that the gentleman from New Jersey had the right to yield the floor without limitation to the gentleman from Indiana, and that the gentleman from Indiana, speaking in his own right, had the right to demand the previous question.

Mr. HOOKER. The gentleman from New Jersey yielded the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, as he stated at the close of his remarks, for the specific purpose of moving the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The point of order was then raised by the gentleman from Mississippi that the gentleman from New Jersey had no right to yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana for the purpose of moving the previous question, and that the Chair had no right to recognize him for such purpose. That point of order the Chair overruled, and from that ruling the gentleman from New York appeals, and the gentleman from New Jersey moves to lay the appeal on the table, which is not debatable.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair has not exactly stated the question.

Mr. COX, of New York. I made the point of order that the gentleman from Indiana had lost control of the question, and that the Chair had no right to recoguize him to move the previous question, and thereby give him the control of the question for an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey demands the yeas and nays upon the pending question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 113, not voting 51; as follows:

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid on the table

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. CRAVENS with Mr. WATSON.

Mr. CROWLEY with Mr. MILLS.

Mr. CURTIN with Mr. HARMER, on this vote.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. BENJAMIN WOOD, for to-day.

Mr. HUBBELL with Mr. MCKENZIE.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to have my vote recorded in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is forbidden under the rules to make that request.

On motion of Mr. CAMP, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. ORTH. I now demand the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution, but before that I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Wisconsin, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. If the House will bear with me for a moment I desire to make a statement which I think will be acceptable to both sides of the House, as due both to the gentleman from Indiana and to the members of the committee. These two resolutions, reported this morning, were referred to a sub-committee on last Friday, of which the gentleman from Indiana is chairman. Some remark was made that the same ground had been covered by a resolution already passed.

The gentleman from Indiana took charge of the two resolutions. He states to me, and I have no doubt he is entirely correct, although I did not hear it nor did other members of the committee, that just as we rose to separate he remarked that if there was no objection to the resolution he would report it to the House. That, I say, I did not hear; but another gentleman, a member of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. LORD,] tells me that he did, and distinctly recollects the circumstance. So I have no doubt that the gentleman from Indiana supposed he had authority from the committee in that informal way to report the resolution. The motion, however, was not put to the committee, nor was it recorded by the clerk upon the minutes.

Now, I suggest that if any gentleman upon either side of the House has any objection to the previous question and desires to make a motion to recommit the resolution the Committee on Foreign Affairs will not object. But, so far as I know, every member on this side of the House is in favor of the resolution if it is deemed essential, and will vote for it.

Mr. RANDALL. Then it is not the report of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I have stated how it is.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then make a motion to recommit it.

Mr. ORTH. If there is a single gentleman on the floor of this House who desires this resolution to be recommitted I will make that motion. If not, I will call the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. COX, of New York. Has the motion to recommit been made?

The SPEAKER. No, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I make that motion. I move to recommit, with instructions.

Mr. CAMP. If the gentleman withholds the motion to recommit we will pass the resolution unanimously.

Mr. ROBESON. I appeal to the gentleman from New York not to delay the passing of the resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANDALL. If I understood correctly the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he stated the committee had never taken a vote on this proposition. I submit it is not a report and not before the House.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is too late to make that point now.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a report got in here without the consent of the committee.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter which the Chair cannot control.

Mr. RANDALL. I can call the attention of the public to it nevertheless.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his motion to recommit?

Mr. COX, of New York. I do, with instructions to insert at the end of the present resolution the following, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And also in reference to the cases of Michael Hart, of Lawrence, Massachusetts; H. O. Mahoney, of Buffalo, New York; and John McEnery, citizens of the United States, now imprisoned in Ireland, with instructions to request the President of the United States to demand of the British Government the prompt trial of these citizens or their prompt release.

Mr. ORTH. I hope this House will recommit the resolution with the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. After the statement made here on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I think it is due to them that that should be done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to recommit the pending resolutions with instructions that the committee report as an amendment thereto what has just been read.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 132, noes 15.

So the motion to recommit with instructions was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARYLAND AND DELAWARE FREE SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. HOBLITZELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4445) to provide for the construction of the Maryland and Delaware Free Ship-Canal as a means of military and naval defense and for commercial purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railroads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the Committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2341) for the relief of colored emigrants; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 89) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Fernando Wood, Matt. H. Carpenter, and Ambrose E. Burnside.

TESTING OF CHAIN ANCHORS.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4446) to require the testing of chain and anchors and for the better securing of life and property on shipboard; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I desire to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. CANNON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. There are several gentlemen on the floor who desire to ask unanimous consent to introduce bills for reference.

Mr. CANNON. I cannot help that. I insist on the regular order.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. No. 3550) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I desire, with the permission of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRESCOTT,] to inquire if we may not facilitate business by taking a recess and holding an evening session for debate only. With the permission of the gentleman from New York who has charge of this bill, I should like to take the sense of the House on this proposition.

Mr. HOOKER. What is the proposition?

Mr. KASSON. I have suggested whether it would not facilitate the public business to hold a session this evening for debate only on the apportionment bill. This would accelerate the time when we could reach a vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion to take a recess is in order, but in the opinion of the Chair it would require unanimous consent to set aside the evening for debate only.

Mr. KASSON. I submit the motion in that sense.

Mr. ANDERSON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The motion to take a recess for the consideration of the bill generally is in order.

Mr. ANDERSON. I know that. But my point is this: there are yet by agreement of the chairman of the committee four hours for debate. Now, in those four hours there are certain gentlemen whose States have interests here who desire to talk not to empty benches, but to this whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman need not state his reasons for the objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. I object.

Mr. KASSON. Then I make the motion in the other form.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock this evening.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 68, noes 97.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to submit the resolution which I offered yesterday. I should say to gentlemen who may not understand it that this resolution is based upon and the vote, if taken in accordance with that resolution, will be upon the old mode of apportionment instead of the new.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the final voting upon the first section of the apportionment bill the vote shall be first taken upon the bill or amendment providing for the largest number of members each bill or amendment providing for a less number to be taken up in its order and voted upon until a number shall be adopted, which shall be the number adopted by the House for the number of members of the Forty-eighth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOOKER. I object.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I desired to make a statement which I think would induce gentlemen to withdraw their objections.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think there will be no objection if we begin with the lowest number and vote up.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I have no objection to that.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the apportionment bill.

Mr. OATES. I desire to offer a proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right under the order of the House to submit an amendment. Does the gentleman desire to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. OATES. I ask to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the apportionment bill, with all the amendments which have been offered thereto, be recommitted to the Committee on the Census, with instructions to report a bill in which the whole number of Representatives apportioned among the several States shall be two hundred and fifty.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order now to offer it for present consideration.

Mr. COX, of New York. To save any difficulty hereafter, I will ask if that motion to commit with instructions is now pending?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. COX, of New York. I gave notice of a motion of that kind, which I wish to reserve the right to make.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not pending. The Chair supposed that it was an amendment to come in under the order of the House, but finds it to be quite different upon hearing it read. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BERRY. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] will give way, I will move that the House now adjourn.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. HERBERT. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BERRY. Then I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to upon a division—ayes 79, noes 84.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] will proceed.

Mr. HERBERT began his remarks, but before concluding, [see page 1168,]

Mr. HATCH said: If the gentleman will yield to me I will renew the motion that the House now adjourn. I am satisfied the House is not in a temper to listen to a debate on the apportionment bill. We would like to be able to hear the gentleman, and I hope he will be allowed to proceed to-morrow.

Mr. BLOUNT. And it is now late in the day.

Mr. HATCH. It is late in the day, and I move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALDRICH.) Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] yield for that motion?

Mr. HERBERT. I do. I am very well satisfied that the House is in no disposition to listen to a debate now. A man might as well expect to go upon a battle-field before the smoke of the conflict has cleared away and get the soldiers to listen to a discussion of constitutional law as to expect this House now to listen to a debate on the apportionment bill. I hope the motion to adjourn will be adopted.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope the motion will be agreed to.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were ayes 83, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before announcing the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn the Chair will submit a request to the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CAMP, indefinitely, on account of important business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the motion to adjourn the ayes are 83, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ATKINS: The petition of Thomas H. Paine, late Census Superintendent, for additional compensation—to the Committee on the Census.

By Mr. J. S. RICHARDSON: The petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, South Carolina, for an appropriation of $750,000 to carry on the work on the jetties during the present year—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SPAULDING: The petition of C. D. Buch and 166 others, citizens of the State of Michigan, for legislation regulating charges for railway transportation—to the same committee.

By Mr. TALBOTT: The petition of John C. Duval, postmaster, and William P. Anderson, assistant postmaster, at Mount Airy, Carroll County, Maryland, for relief—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WILLIS. The petition of Colonel John B. Castleman, Major John H. Leathers, and others, of Louisville, Kentucky, for certain amendments to the militia law—to the Committee on the Militia.

By Mr. YOUNG: The petition of Mrs. Mary Kinneally, for a pension—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, the petition of the Cigar Manufacturers' Association, of Cincinnati, for a reduction in the tax on cigars—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1882.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to resolution of January 10, 1882, information touching the opening for settlement under the pre-emption laws of that part of the Ute reservation in Colorado not assigned to the Southern Ute Indians.

Mr. TELLER. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. It is not necessary to print it.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from Captain William Ludlow, Corps of Engineers, of an examination of Frankford Creek from its mouth in the Delaware River to Frankford avenue, made in compliance with the river and harbor act of March, 3, 1881; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to resolution of February 10, 1882, the report of the Treasury cattle commission on the lung plague of cattle, or contagious pleuro-pneumonia; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of members of the bar of the eastern district of Wisconsin, praying for the passage of an act to create a court of appeals of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, California, in favor of the incorporation of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of California, praying for an amendment to the Constitution providing that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. JACKSON presented the petition of E. E. Elam and others, citizens of Tennessee, praying for such modification and amendment of the patent laws as will protect innocent purchasers of patent rights; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. GEORGE presented two petitions of citizens of Mississippi, praying for such legislation as will prevent unjust discriminations in railroad charges for transportation; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUTLER presented the petition of Fisk Mills, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying for the passage of a bill appropriating money to compensate him for services rendered in the cast and model of the face of General John A. Rawlins; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. HAMPTON presented the petition of T. J. Mackey, in behalf of the State of South Carolina, praying that the Court of Claims may be authorized to adjudicate the claim of that State for rent of the Citadel Academy; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of the trustees of the college of La Grange, Tennessee, and many citizens of Tennessee, praying that compensation be made for damages done the college buildings by their occupancy by the Army of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented resolutions of the Historical Society of Virginia, praying the passage of a law providing for the publication of the manuscripts bearing upon the colonial history of Virginia now belonging to the Congressional Library, and to distribute the publication among the historical societies of the several States; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 999) for the relief of P. L. Ward, widow and executrix of William Ward, deceased, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2223) for the relief of Peter Gallagher, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 230) for the relief of L. S. Ensel, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 31) for the relief of the Sone and Fleming Manufacturing Company, limited, of the city of New York, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 168) for the relief of B. F. Rockefellow, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 697) to confer positive rank in place of relative on the officers of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Navy, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 221) authorizing the President to appoint Frank Jordan upon the retired list of the Navy with the rank of lieutenant, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 162) for the relief of Salmon B. Colby, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that that bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 486) for the relief of Albert Grant, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1205) requiring the removal of railroad tracks from certain streets in the city of Washington, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. SLATER asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1206) for the relief of William Gallich; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file in the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JACKSON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1207) for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WINDOM asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1208) for the relief of Julian W. Dean and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1209) granting a pension to Frances Henly Lear Prescott; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1210) for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble, of the city of Baltimore, Maryland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COKE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1211) making an appropriation for continuing the improvements of Galveston Harbor, State of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1212) for the relief of Catherine Phillips; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JONAS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank of New Orleans, Louisiana, for relief be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CATTLE EXPORTED TO CUBA.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to open negotiations with the Government of Spain for remitting the tax on cattle exported from the United States and imported into Cuba.

DANIEL M. APPEL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to occupy a moment merely to correct an error in a bill. In the bill (S. No. 668) to authorize Dr. Daniel M. Appel, of the United States Army, to receive pay for discharging the duties of physician to the Mescalero Apache Indian agency, New Mexico, passed on the day before yesterday, there are two errors in spelling. I desire that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered and the bill put back to its second reading, so that the errors may be corrected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the bill in the possession of the Senate?

Mr. ROLLINS. It is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has not yet been transmitted to the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROLLINS. It was kept here for the purpose of having the errors corrected. "Mescalero" is spelled wrong in two instances in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the preamble to the bill the name "Mescalero" is not spelled right, and in the body of the bill the same error occurs. The Senator from New Hampshire wants to correct these errors.

Mr. ROLLINS. By striking out the letter "u" and inserting the letter "e" in two instances; so as to read "Mescalero," instead of "Muscalero."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate reconsider the vote on the passage of this bill? The Chair hears no objection, and the vote on the passage of the bill is reconsidered. Now the question is on reconsidering the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and no objection being made it will be taken that that vote is reconsidered. The bill is now in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS. Now I move to strike out in the preamble the letter "u" and insert the letter "e" in "Muscalero." It should be "Mescalero," and not "Muscalero."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS. Now in line 6, of the body of the bill, I move to strike out the letter "u" and insert the letter "e."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

COMMITTEE MESSENGERS.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to call up the resolution reported by me from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, on February 1, to appoint messengers to certain committees named in the resolution. I ask that the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks for the consideration at the present time of a resolution which will be read for information.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint a messenger for each of the following-named committees, to wit, Finance, Post-Offices and Post-Roads, Pensions, Claims, Judiciary, and Engrossed Bills, whose services shall be devoted exclusively to the business of said committees; and that the messengers to be so appointed shall be selected by the said committees, respectively.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to consider the resolution at the present time?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the letter from the Sergeant-at-Arms had better be read, so as to go with the resolution. I do not object to it.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is, Will the Senate consider the resolution now? The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is before the Senate. The letter will be read at the request of the Senator from West Virginia.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

SERGEANT-AT-ARMS, UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, January 23, 1882.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith letters from the chairmen of the Committees on Finance, Post-Offices and Post-Roads, Pensions, Claims, and the Judiciary, suggesting the necessity of providing messengers whose duties shall be confined to the business of said committees, respectively. I respectfully recommend that the appointments designated be made; and, in view of the fact that their services will be limited to the business of the committees, I suggest and request that each committee be authorized to select the person to be appointed. I further recommend that a messenger be provided for the Committee on Engrossed Bills, to be selected by the committee.

Respectfully,

R. J. BRIGHT,
Sergeant-at-Arms, United States Senate.

Hon. JOHN P. JONES,
Chairman of Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Is this in addition to the force already employed by the Sergeant-at-Arms?

Mr. PLATT. It is.

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know upon what principle of selection the report of the committee was based. Had I been advised that a project of this kind was before the committee, or was likely to be considered by the Senate, I should have had something to say about the necessity of a similar officer for the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee, as every Senator knows, has immediate relation with the inhabitants of this District in more ways than probably any other committee of this body. It has more subjects committed to its jurisdiction, and there are more matters requiring the services of an officer of this description than any of those, I believe, that are named. The committee has suffered for the want of a messenger devoted exclusively to its business. It is necessary that messages should be sent, every day nearly, to the District judiciary, to the District commissioners, and to various persons having business before the committee residing in the District. Not having had the opportunity before, I now move to add to the list of committees included in the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I have no doubt that there may be other committees which need the services of a special messenger other than those named in this resolution. This resolution was reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, upon the request of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and that request was made upon the written request to him of the chairmen of the different committees named here. Considering the question we got all the information we could on that subject. We thought that these committees certainly did each need a special messenger. There are but twenty-four messengers in the service of the Senate. We have forty-three committees; we have thirty-nine committee-rooms. The messengers of the Senate have to perform doorkeepers' duties. The Sergeant-at-Arms says that it is impossible to assign messengers specially to committees to be on duty during the day while the Senate is in session.

Now I trust the Senator from Kansas will not insist upon his amendment. There are other committees that I suppose will follow if his amendment should be agreed to, and, as it seems to me, it will much embarrass the passage of this resolution. I want to suggest to the Senator from Kansas that if he feels that the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which I believe he is chairman, needs a messenger as much as these other committees need messengers, he bring that matter before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate as a separate matter and not embarrass this resolution by offering to amend it.

Mr. INGALLS. This will not embarrass the resolution at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Only the Committee on Contingent Expenses have not had time to consider it.

Mr. INGALLS. What necessity for consideration is there? I understand that the chairmen of these committees addressed written communications to the Sergeant-at-Arms that were transmitted to the Committee on Contingent Expenses, saying that they each needed a messenger. I state that there is special and particular reason why the Committee on the District of Columbia need a messenger. The gentleman assigned to that committee for duty is a wounded and disabled soldier, in every way competent for that purpose, and whose services are entirely acceptable to the committee; but there is a vast amount of business, as every gentleman who has served on that committee knows, requiring the transmission of messages almost daily from the committee to the District commissioners, and to the District judiciary, and there has been great inconvenience at this session for the want of some person to perform that labor. It is not anything that requires consideration by the Committee on Contingent Expenses, and if the District Committee had known that there was an arrangement going on by which certain committees were to be provided for, this request would have been filed; but it appears that there was some—I will not say secret arrangement, but some arrangement not made public, by which certain committees were to be provided for. If I thought that my amendment embarrassed the resolution, I would certainly not urge it; but it certainly cannot embarrass the resolution at all. I ask that the amendment may be voted upon.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, having served upon the Committee on the District of Columbia for the last four or five years, I desire to say that the Senator from Kansas is quite right in the statement that he makes. There is certainly no one committee of this body that needs the continuous services of a messenger more than that committee; and if these appointments are necessary, as I am inclined to think they are, I am sure the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas cannot embarrass the resolution, and it ought to be adopted. I favor the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas because of the absolute necessity of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, to insert after "Claims" the words "District of Columbia."

Mr. McMILLAN. It seems to me that the resolution as reported by the committee embraces the names of committees that should have a messenger, and I think the resolution should be passed without any further embarrassment, because if the Committee on the District of Columbia is inserted in the resolution by an amendment there are other committees in the Senate having quite as strong claims for a messenger as that committee. The only question is whether each of the committees named in the resolution shall be provided with a messenger, or whether because other committees entitled to it have none the resolution shall be entirely defeated. If there are any amendments made to this resolution the Committee on Commerce should certainly be inserted also. I do not ask to have the resolution amended; but if it is to be amended by the insertion of any committee, that committee certainly has claims quite as strong as any other committee of the Senate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not understand from the resolution that it fixes the amount of pay these messengers shall have. I ask the chairman of the committee or the Senator who offers the resolution to state what amount is expected to be paid?

Mr. PLATT. The amount of a messenger's compensation is fixed by law, I think. I am not able to state it at this moment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is not an answer to the question. I should like to know the amount we are voting away. I think there are some seven of these committees, and I understand the pay will be $6 a day each. That will be $42 a day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it is $4 a day.

Mr. PLATT. It is at the rate of $1,440 per annum, which is about $4 per day, I believe.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It was stated to me as $6 a day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the pay of a clerk.

Mr. President, speaking for the Committee on the Judiciary, as the gentleman from Kansas has seemed to imply that it was possible that this had been a somewhat selfish arrangement, I wish to say that for at least six years past under both Republican and Democratic organizations of this body, the Committee on the Judiciary has had detailed to its service one of the permanent messengers of the Senate, who, therefore, does not attend to the messenger's duty of guarding the doors and so on during the sessions of the Senate. The detail was applied for in order that the committee might have all the means it could to get on with the enormous mass of business that it has in hand. So this particular movement has not been inaugurated by the Committee on the Judiciary; but in reponse to an invitation from the Sergeant-at-Arms to know whether we could dispense with this messenger so that he could employ him in the ordinary messenger's duties during the session, this answer, by direction of the committee, it being submitted to them, was given.

The Committee on the Judiciary, I think I am safe in saying, has no larger interest in disposing of the public business than the whole body of the Senate. We are willing to do all that we can. If the Senate does not think it wise to supply us with a messenger to be at that room all the time to go for law-books and bills and do the ten thousand things that are constantly required—because the largest part of our work is necessarily done while this body is sitting, when some one of us goes down there and goes to work—if the Senate does not wish to have that committee have the use of this messenger, very good. By just so much the public business will not be done. I shall not have anything more to do, or any less.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word in reference to these messengers. I think where a committee of this body makes a statement either to the Committee on Contingent Expenses or in open session to the Senate, that for the successful discharge of the business of the committee a messenger is required, the Senate ought to grant that. Therefore I trust my friend from Connecticut will not interfere with the Senator from Kansas who is chairman of an important committee, and who states that a messenger is absolutely necessary for the transaction of the business of that committee. I think the Senate will allow all the force in the way of messengers or pages or clerks that may be found necessary from time to time to transact the public business. Therefore I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. FERRY. In behalf of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads I desire to say that so far as that committee is concerned neither the chairman nor as far as I know any member of the committee has asked for a messenger specially; but a messenger has been detailed to that committee as a necessity, necessarily taking him from employment elsewhere; and the Sergeant-at-Arms looking over the business and the efficiency of the business of the Senate has deemed it proper that that committee should be supplied with a messenger. Now, the committee does not care how the messenger is supplied, only it is a necessity and required by the business of that committee. I need not speak of the amount of business before that committee, for all committees are more or less employed; but when it is considered that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has the charge of all the nominations of postmasters throughout the country, and of the controversy that follows necessarily thereupon, it will be seen at a glance that that committee is sufficiently employed. We need a messenger. The Sergeant-at-Arms has felt it his duty to appoint one there, and this is simply providing for a permanent messenger for that committee. I suppose similar reasoning applies to the other committees which he has selected.

Now, so far as the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is concerned, I have no objection particularly to that. If the Senator from Kansas, the chairman of the District Committee, deems it necessary that a messenger should be employed for that committee, I am ready to vote for it. I am ready to vote for any and all officers whose appointment will increase the efficiency of the business of the Senate. I think Senators here are sufficiently employed, their time is sufficiently occupied, and, as far as they can be relieved from unnecessary duties, their necessary duties will be more wisely and more efficiently performed.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether the appointment of these messengers is limited to the session. I can see no special necessity for messengers during the vacation more than we have on the regular roll.

Mr. PLATT. My understanding is that all messengers appointed by the Senate are limited to the session.

Mr. WINDOM. There are some appointed by the year and paid per annum $1,440. I suggest that the resolution be limited to the session, say $4 per day.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I propose the following as an additional resolution:

Resolved further, That each Senator who is not the chairman of a committee shall have the right to appoint a messenger to assist him in the discharge of his public duties when such messenger is not employed in the service of the Senate, and such messenger shall receive $4 per diem during the sessions of the Senate, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

There is something more in the resolution reported by the committee, I think, than appears upon its face. The mode of appointment of messengers to committees of the Senate has always been by the Sergeant-at-Arms, subject, I believe, to supervision by the Vice-President or President pro tempore. This changes the mode of appointment, and gives to the chairmen of the committees named the right to select these messengers. It may be feared that the Sergeant-at-Arms, if he had the appointment, would put some Democrats in place. But has his course justified such a fear? I commend him for the great consideration he has shown to gentlemen on the other side. Certainly his courtesy is fully appreciated on this side of the Chamber.

Gentlemen who happen to be chairmen of committees and who have already been furnished with a clerk have no more duties to perform here than the other members of the Senate; many of them have not near so much duty as is devolved upon other members of this body. They have virtually the assistance of the clerks of the different committees in the discharge of their public business. I certainly do not regret that they have it; on the contrary, I am quite in accord in opinion with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] who found it necessary to introduce a resolution here giving to every Senator a secretary at a pay of $1,200 a year.

No candid man who understands the laborious duties imposed upon every member of this body can deny the proposition that it is absolutely essential to the discharge of the public business, and also essential to the health and personal welfare of Senators, that they should have some assistance in the discharge of their public duties. Men literally work themselves to death in this Chamber and in the duties that are connected with it. They have devolved upon them duties from three to twenty-five or thirty times as great as those that are devolved upon members of the other House. Every Senator here represents, when the population is ratably divided among the number of gentlemen who occupy seats in this Chamber, about seven hundred and fifty thousand people, whereas a member of the House of Representatives represents about one hundred and fifty thousand or one hundred and sixty thousand people. We are not excused from the business which our constituents require us to perform in the different Departments of this Government; we are not excused from the enormous mass of correspondence which comes to our hands almost in proportion to the number of people that we represent above those represented by members of the House. We are accustomed to perform all of these duties, and they are duties of a public character, and we find it absolutely impossible to do it unless we take a portion of the limited means allowed us for the support of our families to employ secretaries, who are an indispensable necessity to the discharge of our duties. The truth is, that upon the pay of a Senator of the United States, when we look at the expenditures he is obliged to incur in the conduct of public business, a man had better be employed in almost any other vocation that I can think of with the expectation of decently providing for his family.

The proposition advanced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is one that recommends itself to the candid judgment, I think, of every man in this body and I should hope of every man in the United States. My proposition is one that is a little more modified. I have the hope that if this additional resolution shall pass, the House of Representatives will not be reluctant to giving us at least $4 per diem for a messenger to be appointed or selected by the Senator himself who happens not to be the chairman of a committee, because if he is the chairman of a committee he can get the assistance necessary in the conduct of his business through that office.

I have not offered this resolution with a view of presenting an impracticable question or with a view to retard the passage of the resolution reported by the committee, but as an act of sheer justice to gentlemen on this floor who are entitled to this much at least of assistance in the discharge of their public business, and I hope the House of Representatives will not be reluctant to provide us the means for putting this little compensation in the hands of these messengers, $4 per diem during the session of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I do wish that the Senate would learn to do one thing at a time. It seems to me that it would be far better to let this resolution pass, and then if the Senator from Alabama desires to test the sense of the Senate on the question of whether every Senator who is not chairman of a committee should have a messenger appointed to be at his service, let us consider that.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, there certainly is very much force in the proposition of the Senator from Alabama, or at least in his argument; and that arises from the fact that we seem to have been driven away from the reason why either clerks or messengers should be employed by committees. That reason is because the public wants of the committees require them, and not the wants of the members or chairmen of the committees. I suppose it is fair to presume at least that these messengers are asked for because of their necessity to wait upon the committees. Now it has grown into a practice here that clerks are appointed to committees where there is certainly no necessity for their appointment; the bestowal of the position is merely regarded as a perquisite, as a favor to the gentleman who is chairman of the committee.

There have been clerks appointed to committees when up to this day the committees have had no session during the two or three months already occupied, and the chances are that some of those committees will have no session, and yet a clerk is appointed; the money is taken out of the Treasury to pay him, and the clerk is only used for the chairman of the committee. I am a little afraid that that is the object of this resolution. It is to give to the chairman of a committee that has a clerk already, and possibly two, an opportunity to have another man paid from the Treasury, a part of whose duty it shall be to wait upon the chairman of the committee rather than upon the committee itself. Now, it may be necessary; possibly it is my inexperience that leads me to conclude that it is not. I have endeavored to attend the sessions of one committee, of which I am an humble member, the Committee on Pensions, which is named in this resolution, and I have failed to see any necessity for the appointment of a messenger to wait upon that committee in the discharge of its duties as a committee. I have endeavored also to discharge my duty as a member of the Committee on Public Lands; I do not know whether that is named here; but I have yet failed to see the necessity of the appointment of a messenger for that committee.

We should do one thing or the other, as the Senator from Alabama says; we should restrict the employment of clerks and messengers to committees to those that are really needed to aid the committees as committees, or give every member of this body the same privilege. I see no reason why one man on this floor should be entitled to appoint one clerk, and possibly two, and then follow up that with the appointment of a messenger, thus giving him three appointees in connection with a committee. I beg leave to differ, as far as my slight experience leads me to judge, as to the necessity of the appointment of messengers to wait upon committees. If they are merely to be appointed for the purpose of aiding the chairman of each committee, then the other proposition is the only true one, that every member of this body should be placed upon an equality. I can see no reason why my colleague, or a gentleman from any other State, should be entitled to have at his service a clerk and then a messenger, if you please, they to be paid from the Treasury of the United States, when the mass of their duty will be to wait upon and answer the correspondence and help discharge the duties of the Senator who happens to be chairman of a committee.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, if the proposition of the Senator from Alabama should prevail it would be manifestly very unjust, for the reason that most of these committees have clerks that are employed nearly all the time for the business of their committees, and therefore the chairmen of such committees would have no use or benefit from a clerk.

Take the Committee on Appropriations. My impression is that the committee has use for the clerk all the time. It is so with very many of the committees, especially in the latter part of the session. Therefore the proposition that each member of the Senate that has no committee chairmanship should have a clerk would be manifestly extremely unjust, because it would give the whole services of a clerk to such members as had no committees, while there would be but a fractional part of the time when the clerks of many committees could be of any service to their chairman.

In relation to the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK,] I do not suppose there are more than two or three committees in the Senate that do not require absolutely the services of a clerk, and many of these committees, take the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Finance, the Committee on the District of Columbia, have need of the services of a messenger during the sessions of the Senate, and especially those committees that have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate. They may want to send to the various Departments, and if they do not have other messengers than they have now, then immediately upon the commencement of the session of the Senate all the messengers authorized to be employed are used about the Capitol building in their other regular business and are not retained for the service of any committee.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] has alluded to the Committee on Pensions, and if he has not said he has intimated very strongly that the chairman of that committee expected to appoint all the clerks and all the messengers, and he says he has not seen any necessity for them. That probably arises from the fact that the Senator has not always been in attendance on the meetings of that committee. There is no committee in the Senate that has so many bills referred to it as that committee, a number that renders it utterly impossible to suppose that any member of this body can give his attention to his due proportion. He might sit down from the beginning of the session to the close, and he would not more than do that if he neglected every other duty. He is not expected to do that; nobody calculates that he will do that.

I came here the other day and asked for an assistant clerk to that committee, stating then, as I state now, that the clerk of the committee of which I am the head had rendered me no personal service whatever. I am writing my own letters, I am dictating my own correspondence, without any assistance from the clerk of that committee. I am receiving from every member of the Senate the letters that are sent to them about pensions, that I must look over and see whether they are proper to be referred to the committee or whether they must go to the Pension Office; for every Senator who receives a letter from a constituent turns it over on the back and indorses it "To the chairman of the Committee on Pensions;" and all of this work is put upon me in addition to the other duties that I owe to the Senate and to the country as a member of this body.

Now I say that a special messenger is very much needed for that committee. The moment the Senate convenes the messenger is taken away and put to a door, and if any member desires to sit down and do the work appertaining to that committee and belonging to it, and wants to send for a book or a paper, he has not any messenger at hand; he must either do it himself, or he must neglect the business and let it go. Now is it economy to save $1,400 a year and neglect this class of claims that press so heavily on every member of the Senate, claims of people who are, perhaps, many of them, indeed a majority of them, undoubtedly entitled to the relief which they are demanding at the hands of the Senate.

I do not believe that anybody will make any capital in this country by that kind of talk. I do not believe that there is 1 per cent. of the people of the United States who are anxious that the Senate should economize to the extent that is suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. I believe the people of the United States will be prepared to indorse the movement of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Georgia to give every Senator in this body a clerk without reference to whether he is the chairman of a committee or whether he is not. What the people want is dispatch of business. Take the Committee on Claims; two hundred cases are there requiring the careful attention of legal minds; and if you sit down to work in that committee and you want a book, where will you get it? Must you trot off to the Library for it yourself or ask the messenger who sits at your door to go? Certainly you expect your messenger to do something, but if he is sitting at the door watching the Senate galleries, if that is part of his duties, it cannot be done.

I say again that, while I am chairman of a committee, I have had no benefit up to this hour from having a clerk to the committee. My clerical work is done not by any clerk of that committee, and if I had five clerks the five clerks could be employed in the committee in doing the legitimate work of the committee, and nobody connected with that committee has called for more labor at the hands of the clerk than the Senator from Nebraska. If he expects the clerk of that committee to do his private correspondence, then he is asking that which the chairman has not asked and which he has no right to ask. He has no right to find fault about it, and he has no right to come here and say that that committee does not need a messenger. If any committee in this body does need a messenger, it is that committee.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I would prefer the resolution of the Senator from Georgia to the resolution I now offer. I have always been afraid, however, that if we passed that resolution the other House would not furnish us with the necessary appropriation. Every Senator who has been here for the last four or five years will remember distinctly the controversies we have had occasionally with the House on the question of the disparity between the allowance to certain officers there and certain officers here of the same class, and we have been at times almost unable to reconcile our differences. Now I believe that a moderate proposition such as I have advanced in this amendment will meet the acceptance of the House; they will see the necessity for it, and it will materially assist Senators in their labors.

Two committees of this body have two clerks each, the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Pensions. I am willing also to vote two clerks to the Committee on the Judiciary. I am satisfied that that committee needs them. It may be true also of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on the District of Columbia. The leading committees of this body in the main require two clerks. So far as I have been connected with them, that has been my observation.

I have had the honor of being a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. That does not need two clerks so far as I understand. One clerk and one messenger are sufficient for that committee; but by special resolution I think some committees should receive this indulgence, or this justice rather, at the hands of the Senate. I think there is a real necessity for a proper transaction of the public business that each Senator should have enough control of his own clerks and his own messengers, if I may so call the clerks and messengers, of the committee over which he presides. I propose to have these men become officers of the Senate, and they may be called upon to discharge public duties by the Sergeant-at-Arms, for my amendment puts them upon an exact footing with the other messengers in that respect; but when they are not engaged in the service of the Senate it provides that they may be engaged in the assistance of Senators in the discharge of their public duties. Our constituencies would be benefited by this arrangement very much more indeed than we should, because it would enable us more promptly to discharge the duties they put upon us.

I therefore hope the Senate will not find any difficulty in adopting the addition to the resolution which I have offered as an amendment. It does not interfere with any part of the original resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FARLEY. I wish to ask what became of the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM?]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He did not offer any amendment.

Mr. FARLEY. I understood him to offer an amendment.

Mr. PLATT. No amendment was offered by him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered was the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] which was carried. The Senator from Minnesota suggested an amendment to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. FARLEY. That amendment was to this effect, that the messengers proposed in the original resolution should receive $4 per diem during the session of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not offered to the Chair. That was talked of between the two Senators.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to express no opinion on the proposition of the Senator from Alabama by the vote which I shall give; but I do not wish to embarrass this resolution with that foreign matter. I shall therefore vote in the negative. When the resolution of the Senator from Alabama comes up as a separate proposition, I shall give it proper consideration.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I rise to appeal to my friend from Alabama to withdraw this proposition and permit us to consider the question of each Senator having a clerk or secretary separately at the proper time. I think these committees have made a good showing, that they have satisfied the Senate that they are entitled to the messenger that each committee asks, and it seems to me there ought to be no division in the Senate in voting to them the messengers they have asked for.

When the time comes to consider the question of giving each Senator a secretary, I trust then we shall have a fair vote upon it, and I trust that our friends on the other side of the Chamber who are chairmen of the different committees and who have secretaries will take a just and liberal view of that subject at that time. I do not think it is probable that we shall get a fair consideration of the question as the matter now stands, but I have great hopes that the Senator from Rhode Island will vote finally for the proposition to give each Senator a secretary, though he now says he must vote against it in this shape. I think, therefore, it would be better that we should consider it separately, and I ask my friend from Alabama, if he concurs in that view, to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I would very cheerfully yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia but for the fact that I am sure if he had had the experience I have had in the Senate he would perfectly understand that the House of Representatives will never vote an appropriation for the payment of a clerk to each member of the Senate at $1,200 a year. They would not vote it for themselves, and they will not vote it for us; and it is only because of that apprehension that I offered the proposition in this form, to call the employés messengers and make them officers of this body, in the hope that the House of Representatives will not undertake to destroy what we believe to be a proper form of organization for this body. That was all.

I prefer the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, and I am quite satisfied it will pass the Senate; but I am just as well satisfied that we never can get an appropriation to carry it out. If we passed the resolution we should be in an unpleasant attitude after having voted to ourselves clerks at $1,200 a year if the House of Representatives should reprimand us in the face of the country by refusing us an appropriation. If I could do all I desired to do I would adopt the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, and would not hesitate about taking that in preference to my own; but if Senators are not aware now they would be very shortly aware after they had passed the resolution of the Senator from Georgia that they would get no money to carry it out.

I have offered this as the only practicable scheme that I know of to enable us to get some assistance in the discharge of our public duties. If Senators do not think it a practical matter, or if they think it is undervaluing them or undervaluing the office, of course let them vote it down. I have no other interest than that which concerns every Senator here who has no chance through his position in the body of obtaining any assistance in the discharge of his public duties. There is an inequality in the present practice which I deplore. When the chairman of a committee has a right to appoint a clerk, it is expected of course that that clerk will assist him in his private business; and so when messengers are assigned to the duties it is expected they will do the same; it is proper that they should do it. There is an inequality in this matter created between different Senators here which falls sometimes very heavily on certain Senators, always falls heavily on the minority. My proposition is merely to see if we cannot get something in the place of this; it is an effort to get part of what is right rather than fail in everything.

I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I do not wish to embarrass this resolution at all. This resolution is not interfered with in the slightest degree by the addition which I propose to put to it by way of amendment. The resolution may pass just as it is. I am not opposed to allowing to these committees additional force, though I think it is rather peculiar that the method of appointment should be changed under present circumstances, especially when the other side has recently refused to allow us to have a reading clerk, an officer who is very much needed here, because they were apprehensive there might be some political advantage in it. The appointment of these officers ought really to be under the general rule of the Senate. There is no occasion for giving to a committee the right to appoint a messenger in one case unless it is given to the committees in every case. The Senate of the United States does itself no credit by patching up a scheme of this kind. Let gentlemen come forward and act on principle. If the Sergeant-at-Arms ought not to be intrusted with the appointment of messengers, take it away from him. If he should be intrusted with it in one case, he should in others. Let not an arrangement be patched up by which he is to have power to appoint nominally for the purpose of transferring that power to the political majority of a committee held by the other side. I do not like that, and it is not candid and it is not manly. For that reason more than anything else, I have brought this proposition forward now.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall vote, Mr. President, for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. I prefer the proposition of the Senator from Georgia to allow each Senator a clerk, for I think every Senator on this floor is entitled to one; I feel that I am, but inasmuch as it is uncertain whether or not we can get that proposition through I shall vote for this as the next best thing to do. I have no fear of any complaint being made by any reasonable man at our being allowed such necessary force as will enable us to discharge properly our public duties. I shall vote for this proposition, fearing that the proposition of the Senator from Georgia may not succeed.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Georgia, as the Chair should have informed the Senator from Alabama, that this is a proceeding under the Anthony rule, and two talks on the subject are not allowable.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senate will allow me one minute, I simply desire to say that I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Alabama, if he presses it, as the best we can get now; but I think we shall have a better chance of passing his proposition as an amendment to mine when it comes up if we take it separately and do not interfere with this.

Mr. MORGAN. I would not undertake to amend the proposition of the Senator from Georgia at all. I will vote for his resolution in preference to my own.

Mr. BROWN. My suggestion was that the Senator from Alabama withdraw this amendment here, and if he chooses offer it as an amendment to my resolution when it comes up regularly. Let these committees have the messengers they desire, and then let us take the other proposition, leaving it to their generosity and their sense of justice to give us the clerks that we ought to have. I shall vote for this amendment if it is pressed, but I prefer not to have it in this shape.

Mr. CALL. I shall vote for the resolution reported by the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I would vote for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama if it were a separate resolution, and I shall vote for the resolution of the Senator from Georgia in preference when it comes up.

I desire to say that I regard the service of the Senate as lamentably deficient for the public use. It needs more force, and I think the dignity of this body is such that when Senators, whatever may be their political opinions, rise in their places and say that their committees need additional service of messengers or clerks, the great duties which rest on this body require of every one of us that proper respect should be paid to that declaration of a committee. Therefore, while willing to vote for the convenience of gentlemen on the other side any additional force which they may say the Senate ought to have, I shall vote against the amendment of my friend from Alabama, while I would gladly vote for it as a separate proposition and also vote for the resolution, which I hope will be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I call the attention of my friend from Connecticut to the fact that there is no provision for the payment of these messengers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can be regulated afterward.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But that should go with the resolution; it belongs to it. It ought to be stated here how these messengers shall be paid.

Mr. PLATT. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. The Senator from Connecticut intends, as he informed the Chair, to make a separate proposition on the matter indicated by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that; but there must be a way provided for paying them, unless the Senator wishes to provide for it in another resolution. I call his attention to it, not wishing to oppose the resolution.

Mr. PLATT. I had supposed that would be provided for in a bill which is soon to go before the Appropriations Committee. I understand that it will be.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But how are they to be paid in the mean time?

Mr. PLATT. They will not be paid until then, I presume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called.

Mr. CONGER. Let the proposition be stated again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CONGER. Which is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the end of the resolution to add what will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the amendment proposed by Mr. MORGAN.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] on all political questions; but being perfectly satisfied that he would vote for this proposition, I shall vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired for to-day with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. VAN WYCK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 10, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—10.

Brown,	Jackson,	Morgan,	Williams.
Butler,	Johnston,	Teller,
Hampton	Jonas,	Voorhees,

NAYS—38.

Aldrich,	Davis of W. Va.	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Allison,	Edmunds,	McDill,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Bayard,	Garland,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Blair,	Groome,	Maxey,	Slater,
Call,	Harris,	Miller of Cal.	Vest,
Camden,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.	Walker,
Coke,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Windom.
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Pugh,

ABSENT—26.

Beck,	George,	Kellogg,	Ransom,
Cameron of Pa.	Gorman,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Cameron of Wis.	Grover,	Lapham,	Sewell,
Dawes,	Hale,	Logan,	Vance,
Fair,	Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,	Van Wyck.
Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Mitchell,
Frye,	Jones of Nevada.	Pendleton,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT. In accordance with the suggestions of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] I will offer an amendment to the resolution to add to the end of it:

And shall be paid at the rate of $1,440 per annum during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that after the word "paid" he insert "out of the contingent fund of the Senate."

Mr. PLATT. This is not to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. It requires an appropriation, and will be estimated for in the deficiency bill which is coming from the other House.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend by striking out these words, beginning in next to the last line:

And that the messengers to be so appointed shall be selected by the said committees respectively.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question first is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] Is it the pleasure of the Senate to continue this subject until it is disposed of, the hour of half past one having arrived?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is continued before the Senate. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. MORGAN. My amendment is to strike out all after the word "committees" in the line next to the last, as follows:

And that the messengers to be so appointed shall be selected by the said committees respectively.

I have not heard any reason stated for departing from the rule of the Senate that gives such appointments as these to the Sergeant-at-Arms. I therefore propose to ask a vote of the Senate on this point, to learn whether there is any necessity for changing the rule of the Senate which has been in force for a great many years. All the other messengers are appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I do not know whether the committee that needs a messenger is consulted in making these appointments, but I presume it is. I desire this matter to go according to the ordinary rules of the Senate. Let the Sergeant-at-Arms make the selection and also the appointment. Where is the use of the chairman of a committee making the selection and the Sergeant-at-Arms making the appointment? It is like a case of confirmation by the Senate of an appointment by the President. The Senator is to select a man as messenger of his committee; then the Sergeant-at-Arms is to have the appointing power, to say whether he will appoint him or not. It seems to me that is not only an unnecessary departure from the rules in this case, but a very peculiar one, and one certainly without precedent and, as far as I can understand, without reason. If the Sergeant-at-Arms can appoint, without consulting any Senator, twenty-four messengers for the different committees of this body and to attend to the doors around the Senate part of the Capitol, why may he not appoint the remainder without having Senators make the selection? Where is the reason for giving to any one Senator in this body, though he may be chairman of a committee, the power to select officers of the Senate? How can we get rid of them if we do not like them? How are we going to turn them out of office if they are appointed in this way? It should be, it seems to me, by the appointing power; and is this body to have any voice in the matter at all? The power is conferred on a Senator to make a selection, and the Sergeant-at-Arms to confirm and ratify his choice. If he refuses to ratify that choice, it may lead to difficulty; and how could we ever get rid of such an officer if he should become obnoxious to the body at large? There is too much private work in this business, too much evasion of duty in this business, too great self-denial. I do not understand it at all. Therefore I move to strike out that part of the resolution, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I only desire to say a word with reference to the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

It is a mistake to say that this is without precedent. The Committee on Appropriations has had a messenger for many years for the exclusive use of that committee, and every appropriation for the payment of that messenger has had inserted in it a provision that the messenger should be selected by the committee. So I presume the Sergeant-at-Arms in making this suggestion supposed he was acting in accord with the usages of the Senate, and I can see a very good reason why he should so desire. These messengers are for the exclusive use of the committees to which they are to be assigned. It would seem natural that each committee should have something to say about the character of its messenger.

Of course I care nothing about the matter; I only wished to correct the mistake that the Senator from Alabama seemed to have fallen into.

Mr. MORGAN. I would suggest to the Senator that we change the language of the resolution and let the committee make the appointments, instead of the Sergeant-at-Arms being directed to make the appointments on the selection of the committee.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Anthony rule will be enforced, and five minutes be allowed to each Senator, and no second talking.

Mr. VEST. I have just come into the Senate, and I understand that this is a proposition to increase the number of messengers by six. If I am correct in my understanding of the proposition, I am opposed to it. I wish to oppose every increase of officers of the Senate. I claim to be ordinarily liberal in the matter of expenditures for the conduct of the public business; but in my judgment an increase of officials connected with the Senate and with the other House has come to be an absurdity, if not a public nuisance. It is a notorious fact that there is almost an army of employés here absolutely doing nothing. In one of the public journals yesterday I noticed a statement uncontradicted, and I presume it is true, that there is an employé upon the rolls of the Secretary of the Senate drawing $720 a year and performing no conceivable duty—nothing at all.

Now, sir, I simply want to state for myself that I shall be accessory to no such thing as this increase of officials when there is no necessity for it. Every committee wants a messenger, for what? Those of us who have been chairmen of committees know that in nine cases out of ten their duties amount to simply nothing at all. They sit one or two hours in the morning at the door of a committee which probably does not meet once in three weeks or three months; they draw their salaries; and we are told that in order to perform this extraordinary and onerous duty there must be one messenger to each committee.

Mr. President, if we want messengers for each Senator let us vote them squarely and fairly; if we want secretaries for each Senator let us vote them; and I am willing to vote to-day upon that proposition; but this indirect, circuitous, underhanded way of taking money out of the Treasury on the pretense of advancing the public business is simply monstrous, and I want to vote against it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll will be called on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the day with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.] If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

Mr. VAN WYCK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER,] but learning from his colleague that he would probably vote "yea" upon this question, and as I propose to vote "yea," I think it will not be any breach of my arrangement with the gentleman from Oregon if I vote "yea." I accordingly do so.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Brown,	Garland,	Maxey,	Vest,
Butler,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Call,	Jackson,	Slater,	Walker,
Coke,	Jonas,	Vance,	Williams.
Farley,	Jones of Florida,	Van Wyck,

NAYS—30.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Plumb,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Ferry,	McDill,	Saunders,
Bayard,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Harris,	McPherson,	Teller,
Camden,	Hawley,	Miller of N. Y.,	Windom.
Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Davis of W. Va.,	Ingalls,	Platt,

ABSENT—27.

Beck,	George,	Jones of Nevada,	Morgan,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Lamar,	Pendleton,
Cameron of Wis.,	Grover,	Lapham,	Ransom,
Cockrell,	Hale,	Logan,	Saulsbury,
Conger,	Harrison,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Fair,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman.
Frye,	Hill of Georgia,	Mitchell,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution as amended on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. FARLEY. I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution as amended will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint a messenger for each of the following-named committees, to-wit: Finance, Post-Offices and Post-Roads, Pensions, Claims, District of Columbia, Judiciary, and Engrossed Bills, whose services shall be devoted exclusively to the business of said committees, and that the messengers to be so appointed shall be selected by the said committees, respectively, and shall be paid at the rate of $1,440 per annum during the sessions of the Senate.

Mr. FARLEY. Now, I should like to know the necessity for these extra messengers when the Senate is not in session. There will be several months in the year——

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is provided in the resolution that they shall only last during the session.

Mr. PLATT. It provides that they shall be paid only during the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. BUTLER. On the question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN. I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Rollins,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Johnston,	Sawyer,
Bayard,	Gorman,	McDill,	Teller,

Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Mitchell,	Sherman,
Frye,	Kellogg,	Morgan,	Vance.

So the resolution as amended was agreed to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION

Mr. MILLER, of California. I wish to give notice that when the regular order, the bill in charge of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] is finished, I shall move to take up the bill (S. No. 71) to enforce treaty stipulations relating to the Chinese. It being a matter of great importance, I trust the Senate will sustain me in that motion.

PUNISHMENT OF BIGAMY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 353) to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I give way to my friend from Florida [Mr. CALL] who, by understanding yesterday, was to address the Senate at this time on the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

ARREARS OF PENSIONS ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] on the 12th of January, relative to the arrears of pensions act, will be regarded as before the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I propose to make a few observations on the resolution of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] declaring that the act known as the arrears of pensions act should not be repealed. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate for any great period. My object is simply to present to the Senate my views in regard to the general character of pensions, the relations which those already pensioned sustain to those who are yet unprovided with a pension.

All pensions are grants from the State to an individual as a recompense for services to the public. That recompense is a pension grant; as the word implies, is one which protects the individual against the consequences of his acts and sacrifices in behalf of the State by a continuous contribution for his support and that of his family, so far, at least, as to provide them with the necessaries of life, for this is the least substitute which can be given for that ability to support himself which he has sacrificed at the command of the State. Hence, every pension law must be controlled by two considerations:

First, the ability of the State to pay or provide these necessaries.

Second, the adequacy and efficiency of the pension or payment for the support and protection of the pensioner and his family against want. The pension should be at least sufficient to provide the pensioner and his dependents with the necessaries of life, and it must vary with the degree of his disability or capacity to earn something for his own support and that of his family or dependents. Tried by this just standard of argument and reason, the question whether arrears of pension or an increase of pension, commencing with the passage of the act and running through the future, is more beneficial and adequate for the comfortable support of the pensioner, is simply a question whether the payment of a large sum of money passing through several hands to a needy person unaccustomed to the possession and use of large sums of money is better for him or his family than a smaller sum annually paid directly to the pensioner as an annuity for life.

I think the smaller amount annually paid would be more beneficial to him and more efficiently accomplish the object of a pension law, namely, the continued support of the pensioner and his protection against want during his life-time. This proposition seems to be clear, and if true cannot be affected by any considerations relating to the obligation of the Government, the extent of the national gratitude, or the privations of the soldier during the war. These considerations are of force to determine the fact whether a pension should be granted, but they do not in any way touch the question of what amount will be adequate for his necessities, or what manner of payment will be most beneficial to him.

The question of the methods of proof and decision which will most expedite the payment and best protect the State against fictitious and fraudulent claims, is also in its nature entirely disconnected from the others and not in any way related thereto. Neither are the considerations touching the amount, the large or the small amount, demanded by the system of pension laws, proper ones to determine whether or not this law should be continued or should be repealed, unless they are such as are beyond the reasonable ability of the State and its resources to bear.

I take occasion here to say that in regard to the methods of distribution and payment and the alleged frauds upon the service, I am inclined to the opinion that the most satisfactory, expeditious, least obnoxious, and surest method of proof would be to allow any applicant to go before a State court nearest to him, at the expense of the Government, and submit his proofs, the Government providing for contesting evidence on its part, and for the transmission of the record to some Department at the capital, with the power of revision and approval or disapproval.

This would present a record which would, in nearly all cases, be as conclusive as could well be obtained, and would be such as would enable the authorities here either to approve or disapprove finally, and without delay, the finding of the court below.

I do not share in the unfriendly criticisms against claim or pension agents which are sometimes made. In my service on the Committee on Pensions in the Senate there was no evidence ever presented, in my knowledge, showing a want of fidelity to their clients or a willful participation in frauds on the Government. Those who came before the committee were representatives of large numbers of these claims, and came there with testimonials of good character. They were evidently business men of intelligence. Neither can I perceive that the Senators who supported the existing law are subject to any just censure. There can be no question that the obligation of the state to take care of a pensioner commenced with the period of his disability; and, in case of widows, children, and dependents, with the period of death in the service of the State. Whether this could better be done by arrears of pension or by an increase of pension for the future is an open question, and the respective economy of the two methods is a point which is not even now ascertained.

In the whole of this discussion on the subject of arrears of pension there has been nothing in the animadversions and unfriendly criticisms upon the law and those who passed it; nothing of argument, nothing except simply the fact of the enormous amount to which the pension laws have settled.

It is perfectly clear to me that the State being able to do so, the duty and obligation to support soldiers who had sacrificed their ability to support themselves at the command of the state and under a pledge from the whole body of the people that they should be provided for cannot be controverted, and this duty and obligation could not be performed otherwise than by recognizing in some form the fact that the obligation commenced at the period of disability or death.

If the friends of the soldier supported him from the period of discharge to the time when his pension was granted, then they only did what the Government was bound to do, and did it because of the Government's default in performing its obligation. Hence it is evident that no blame can be attached to those who voted to affirm an obligation both in law, in morals, and good policy. The question of one or another method of performing this obligation is evidently a question of method only; and there was but one method before Congress or the country at the time.

Whether the method of arrears or the method of future increase is better for the pensioner is a question of pure argument and reason, which cannot be varied or affected by sympathy for the soldier or the cause for which he fought, nor by any consideration of economy on the part of the Government. But these considerations do not touch the resolution as it stands; certainly the repeal of the act now could not be justified without either showing that the State was unable to pay, and the burden unreasonable in its exactions upon the industries of the people, or by substituting a better law for the increase for the future of the pension of those who have not received the arrears under the existing law.

Neither of these things having been done or attempted, it would certainly be ungracious in this state of facts for this repeal to be effected by southern votes while the votes of the Northern States are opposed to its repeal.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the repeal of a law founded in public justice, unassailed by argument, because a public clamor has been raised as to the amount which it takes from the Treasury. So long as that amount is not an unreasonable burden upon the industries of the country there is no ground of argument which should be heard in the American Senate. When a law recognizes an obligation of the highest and most sacred character, there is no ground upon which its repeal should be advocated here, because, within the limits of the ability of the people and the Government to pay, it is a large and even an enormous transaction.

I consider that the system of pensions, the support of the disabled soldier or citizen who has sacrificed his ability to support himself and his family at the command of the State and in obedience to the will of the people, is a ground of public law and of public policy which is not only well founded in the necessities of the country but in the history of all past legislation and of all former governments.

I have introduced an amendment to the resolution predicated upon these grounds and sanctioned by the same considerations, upon which it has been my special purpose to address the Senate. It is an amendment in which not only the people of my own State and my own section, but of the Northwest, of all the new States, are greatly interested. It is an amendment by which a pension is proposed to be granted to all the survivors of the Indian wars previous to 1845, and it comes upon the resolution in connection with the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] granting a pension to the survivors of the Mexican war. I know of no subject of greater importance than this to the legislation of the country. It is an obligation which has long rested upon the country and which has as yet not been recognized. The survivors of these wars are rapidly passing away; they are but few in number, old and feeble, with a premature feebleness caused by their services and sacrifices to the country.

Every argument and reason which justifies or demands the passage or the continuance of pensions to the disabled soldiers of the war for the Union demands the adoption of this amendment, declaring that a pension should be granted to the needy or disabled survivors of the Mexican and Indian wars before 1845.

If we examine it in point of argument, how will this case be different from the soldiers of the war for the Union? Shall we find the difference in the fact that they are survivors of ancient wars and not persons who became disabled in the line of duty and while in service? But this is a mere assumption as to the cause of their present disability and need. The presumptions from fact, the weight of evidence, the rule of reason is that given a cause capable of producing an effect; the effect in the absence of other evidence is the result of the given cause.

The character of the wars in which these survivors were engaged, the nature of the services which they performed, the severe marches, the long-continued exposure, the service by night, the constant alarm, the great excitements were more than adequate to produce this effect; and now, when we find them few in number and needy and disabled, it would be equally unreasonable to apply to them the severe methods of proof which are properly applicable to recent wars. I affirm, then, that there is no ground of reason upon which you can difference the claim of the needy or disabled survivors of the Mexican and Indian wars from that of the soldiers of later wars disabled in the line of duty and while in the service.

If you seek to find the difference will you find it in the extent of their sacrifices, the degree of their courage, or in the value of the results to the country of their courage, self-sacrifice, and patriotic devotion. These are all the elements that can reasonably enter the consideration or affect the decision of the question. In point of hardships, self-sacrifices, and courage, what comparison does civilized warfare bear to that waged with the savage?

What shall compare with the horrors of murdered children, outraged women, the burned cabin, the torture by fire, and every horrid punishment which could give pain to body or mind, which were the constant incidents of Indian warfare and of frontier life? What courage can compare with that of the soldier in Indian warfare in his solitary march, his lonely camp-fire, his watch in the dark and cold?

In results which are material and realized, and not the subject of speculation and party opinion, what an empire of territory has been opened and acquired by the Indian and Mexican wars—almost a world in extent, now peopled with an active and enterprising population with all the arts of industry and production. The question recurs then, Shall the people of native and foreign birth to whom these lands have been given without money or price refuse to contribute something from their rich gift for the support of the old soldiers of the country, and to keep them and their children from starvation?

Mr. President, no better people than these frontiersmen and these survivors of the Indian and Mexican wars ever lived. The circumstances of their lives developed the most distinguished virtues, and these virtues impelled them to give their time and services to the country freely and without stint. The amendment limits the provision sought to the needy or disabled.

Surely there can be no reason for denying it. I would have preferred that the resolution should have declared that a pension should be granted to all the survivors of these wars without reference to their condition of disability or need. Their numbers are small, and the burden upon the Treasury would not be great; but the Senator from Kansas accepted the amendment as to the survivors of the Mexican war with the limitation to needy or disabled survivors, and I believe he will accept this amendment with the same limitation. A liberal expenditure of the public money in aid of the people and for the relief of proper objects of the public bounty is a wise economy; while the most rigid parsimony in expenditure accompanied by a denial of public obligation and personal rights leads only to lavish expenditure for unworthy objects, and is more injurious to the great body of the people than reckless extravagance.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I hope that the resolution of the Senator from Kansas will be adopted with the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina and the amendment which I have offered, my amendment being that the survivors of the Black Hawk war, the wars of the Northwestern Territories and States, and the survivors of the Creek and Seminole wars previous to the year 1845 who are needy and disabled, shall be placed upon the pension list. As I said, there is no consideration of public duty and of the established policy of the Government which does not demand of every man, of every Senator and every member of Congress, that these poor, needy, disabled people, who have given their lives in the midst of the greatest hardships and with the most wonderful results of good to the country, should receive something from the millions of people who are now occupying the public lands, given to them without money and without price, which were subdued and converted from the savage by these meritorious people. I am in receipt of numerous letters from the survivors of the Mexican and Indian wars who are in absolute destitution, who have lived lives of honesty and with the respect of their fellow-men; who have been foremost in every encounter with the Indians; who have been upon the frontier all their lives, and who, having wrested that country from the savage and opened it for settlement, are now left in absolute want and starvation in their old age. I hope the amendment will be brought to a vote.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment of the Senator from Florida be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution:

And that the needy or disabled survivors of the Indian wars before the year 1845, including the Black Hawk, Creek, and Seminole wars, should be granted a pension.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask for the regular order.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 3870) to change the name of the National Mechanics' Banking Association of New York to that of Wall Street National Bank; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees of the House shall begin.

PUNISHMENT OF BIGAMY.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GROOME in the chair.) The regular order, which is Senate bill No. 353, is demanded.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 353) to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 7, after "United States," to strike out "has" and insert "have;" so as to read "over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 11, after the words "United States," to strike out "has" and insert "have;" so as to read "over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 12, to strike out "bigamy" and insert "polygamy;" so as to read "is guilty of polygamy, and shall be punished by a fine," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Secretary reads the next reported amendment, I ask leave to offer an amendment to come in properly as section 2, which in the making of the draft of the bill as reported was omitted by accident. It is a mere saving clause to the chapter of the Revised Statutes amended by the first section. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the first section these words:

SEC. 2. The foregoing provision shall not affect the prosecution or punishment of any offense already committed against said section hereby amended.

It was a mere accident in the draft by the clerk that that was not put in. It should come in as section 2; because it is an amendment of a section of the Revised Statutes, and for it to be in the amended section would be incongruous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That should now be section 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The changes in the numbers of the sections will be made to correspond with the additional section which has just been incorporated in the bill.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a new section:

SEC. 3. That if any male person, in a Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, hereafter cohabits with more than one woman, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $300, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 4. That counts for any or all of the offenses named in sections 1 and 2 of this act may be joined in the same information or indictment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On account of the change in the numbers that should read "sections 1 and 3 of this act," instead of "sections 1 and 2."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reported by the committee will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In section 5, line 1, after the word "bigamy," it is proposed to insert "polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation;" in line 5, after the word "bigamy," to strike out "or;" in line 6, after "polygamy," to insert "or unlawful cohabitation with more than one woman;" in line 7, after the word "offense," to strike out "prohibited" and insert "punishable;" in line 8, after "by," to insert "either of," and in the same line, after "foregoing," to strike out "section" and insert:

Sections, or by section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy in the Territories of the United States and other places, and disapproving and annulling certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah;"

So as to read:

That in any prosecution for bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, under any statute of the United States, it shall be sufficient cause of challenge to any person drawn or summoned as a juryman or talesman, first, that he is or has been living in the practice of bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation with more than one woman, or that he is or has been guilty of an offense punishable by either of the foregoing sections, or by section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 16, after the words "believes it," to strike out "morally, religiously, or legally;" so as to read:

Or, second, that he believes it right for a man to have more than one living and undivorced wife at the same time, or to live in the practice of cohabiting with more than one woman.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 24, after "question," to strike out "may" and insert "shall;" so as to read "and this question shall be tried by the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 25, after the word "challenge," to strike out "above" and insert "before;" so as to read "but as to the first ground of challenge before mentioned."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 31, to strike out the words "under this section" and insert "for any offense named in sections 1 or 2 of this act;" so as to read:

And if he shall answer as to said first ground, his answer shall not be given in evidence in any criminal prosecution against him for any offense named in sections 1 or 2 of this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment should read "sections 1 or 3 of this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 32, before the word "ground," to strike out "the" and insert "any;" and after the word "ground" to strike out "that his answer may tend to criminate himself;" so as to read:

But if he declines to answer on any ground, he shall be rejected as incompetent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 2, after the word "offenders," to strike out the words—

Against section 1 of the act of July 1, A. D. 1862, entitled "An act to punish and prevent the practice of polygamy in the Territories of the United States and other places, and disapproving and annulling certain acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah," and section 5352 of the Revised Statutes as it stood before the passage of this act, for offenses committed before January 1, A. D. 1879, and to insert "guilty before the passage of this act of bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation;" so as to make the section read:

That the President is hereby authorized to grant amnesty to such classes of offenders guilty before the passage of this act of bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, on such conditions and under such limitations as he shall think proper; but no such amnesty shall have effect unless the conditions thereof shall be complied with.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest that the words proposed to be inserted should be changed so as to insert the words "before the passage of this act" after the word "cohabitation." As it is now, it would appear that the act of bigamy was what was passed instead of the act of Congress. I suggest that it read "guilty of bigamy, polygamy, or unlawful cohabitation, before the passage of this act."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure the committee has no objection to that transposition, for it means the same thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be so modified, if there be no objection. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as modified.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to put a question in regard to this section, which perhaps would not be regularly in order while the committee's amendments are under consideration, but as the section has just been read, it would be perhaps convenient to ask it now. My question is whether it is intended to affirm the right of Congress to grant to the President of the United States the power to grant amnesty to classes of offenders? The Constitution gives him the power to grant pardons and reprieves. This section seems to imply that the President by proclamation or in some other way will have, not a suspensive power, but a power to annul as to any particular class or number of offenders—that is, of course, as to any offense under a particular act of Congress—on such terms, within such limitations as he may see fit. That goes very far toward clothing the President with a legislative power; a power which would be a legislative power certainly if it would be appropriate to be granted to a Legislature by the Constitution, if we were defining the powers of the different departments of the Government. I would suggest that the words "classes of," in line 2 of the section, be stricken out.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the words "classes of" were stricken out I fear that then it would come down to merely an ostensible authority to grant a pardon, which the President clearly and directly and specifically has under the Constitution.

The subject of amnesty as distinghished from pardon was under consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary a good many years ago, (when I remember Senator Hendricks of Indiana was one of its members,) concerning the act of Congress, passed some time during the civil war, authorizing the President of the United States to grant amnesty by classes, or to masses of people engaged in conducting a civil war against the United States, on such terms and in such way as he thought the public interest should require. Afterwards Congress repealed that act. The act evidently was passed, in the time of it, on the English theory, which was supposed to have been the critical basis of the Constitution of the United States as to pardons and reprieves, which the English Crown always had as a prerogative; but in respect of classes of offenders, a great public disturbance like our civil war and like the civil wars of Great Britain, it was nearly if not quite universal that the King by and with the advice and consent of the Lords and Commons, by an act of Parliament, granted amnesty by classifications, or the act authorized the executive power to grant it to offenders.

Although the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case that arose after this legislation of Congress repealing the amnesty clause in the form of a statute, decided that in a particular case a proclamation of President Johnson that purported to be a proclamation of amnesty, did operate as a pardon of the offender, the committee did not wish to give away the political right of the two Houses of Congress to control amnesty; that is, the release of great masses of people from the hands of justice into the hands of the Executive; nor did they desire at this time to go upon the idea that it was an exclusive right of Congress. Accordingly, whatever may be said about what is the right of the President under the Constitution to grant amnesty as distinguished from a technical pardon, we thought it better to insert in the bill this clause, so that if the President chose to act either under his own authority, if he thought so, or under this bill, if he thought that, if it turned out that it required the authority of law to grant these reliefs by general classifications and not by a warrant of pardon, it would be held good. Therefore we thought we should be enabled to pass over this doubt in point of law and put it in such a way that neither the Executive nor the two Houses of Congress would be understood as renouncing any of their constitutional rights. That was our object.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the power to grant conditional pardons has obtained in a great many of our States; I know it has in some; but without having an opportunity to examine the statutes of those States in detail, I believe it will be found that in all cases the condition which may be imposed upon the pardon is a condition itself authorized by law, prescribed by the Legislature within certain limits; as, for instance, a man is pardoned from the State's prison on condition that his sentence is partly executed, on condition that he commit no criminal offense within the time for which his sentence originally would run, it being understood that if he does he may be retaken and committed anew and his original sentence be served out under the order of the court. That is the law in my own State.

But this section seems to me to be open to the objection that it not merely authorizes the President to grant pardons on a large scale by giving him the authority to grant amnesty to classes, the constitutionality of which is extremely doubtful, because the Constitution limits the power of the President to pardons and reprieves, which have a technical and very well understood legal meaning, and which is a meaning other and which defines something else than the power, without regard to the individual case, to suspend or terminate the operation of a criminal law upon a particular class of offenders who have not even been convicted. This is open, in the first place, to that very grave and serious constitutional question of the right by legislation to extend a constitutional power, carefully there limited and restricted to the case of pardon or reprieve, which applies to the individual case, to classes of offenders, and especially to classes of offenders who never have been indicted or tried.

That is certainly a very doubtful proposition; but the other objection seems to me to be at first blush almost free from doubt, that it is not within the competency of Congress to clothe the President with the power of imposing at his discretion conditions upon an amnesty granted by him. What is to be the extent and limit of the conditions which this one-man power may prescribe? May the President grant amnesty to large classes of persons on condition that they pay a large sum of money to him or to some charitable use prescribed by him, or to the use of the Government even; on condition that they exile themselves; on condition that they change their occupation; on condition that they cast a vote of a particular character or refrain from casting a vote of a particular character; on condition that they continue to observe some course of conduct prescribed by him for the future?

I submit, Mr. President, that the conditions which may be imposed for the operation of a power of pardon to an individual case or of amnesty in a class of cases are conditions which the law-making power must define or limit, and that it is a monstrous proposition in principle to undertake to clothe the President of the United States with a power like this. If we may constitutionally say that the Mormons of the Territory of Utah, some one hundred and twenty-five thousand persons in number, I suppose the adult males of that Territory are some twenty-five thousand persons in number now, who are living in the practice of polygamy, in accordance with their religious or alleged religious belief, may be excluded from the operations of a penal act of the Legislature on such conditions as the President of the United States may impose, we may clothe him with that authority with reference to every criminal law which is placed on the statute-book by the authority of the national Legislature. We take a step which involves that power and that consequence in principle.

I respectfully submit to the consideration of the learned and able chairman of the committee that reported this bill that there is nothing in the necessity of the present case which makes it worth while to introduce into our legislation a principle which carries us to that dangerous extent. May the President of the United States at his sole will prescribe the conditions upon which every violator of the revenue acts, every pirate, every committer of a crime of murder, of burglary, of highway robbery, of larceny, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, shall have a general amnesty? In other words, the bill enacts as it now reads that the President of the United States may repeal a criminal law enacted by Congress on such conditions as by his sole will he shall prescribe.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad my friend from Massachusetts has called the attention of the Senate to this interesting subject; and it certainly is interesting; but I think the Senator from Massachusetts will see when he studies, as he has done, the history of the Constitution of the United States, that the power of granting pardons and reprieves was drawn technically and specifically from English jurisprudence; that those words were used in the Constitution with industry; and that when amnesties were granted under the English constitution they were by act of Parliament, sometimes absolute, sometimes conditional in the act, leaving it to the Crown to determine upon what conditions and under what circumstances an amnesty should be granted.

The Supreme Court of the United States, as I have stated, has held in one case, under one proclamation of President Johnson, that that had the effect, after the repeal of the act to which I have referred which granted him that authority, or purported to do so, to leave still in him the power to grant pardons in that way. That may be the correct law. It may not be the correct law. What the committee desired to do was to make it so that if the President did think it fit by classifications and not as it regards individual cases, convicted or not convicted, he could say to a great body of people in that Territory, "If you will stop this violation of the law now and sin no more, you shall not be harried and prosecuted for what you have already done." That is what we wanted to accomplish, if it meets the views of the Senate. In order to accomplish it, these people having complied with the conditions of amnesty by the President, we did not wish to leave them exposed to any critical doubt or difficulty in a court of justice hereafter as to being able to defend, if some enemy of theirs should institute a prosecution. That is what we wanted to accomplish, and I am sure it would meet the wishes of my friend from Massachusetts.

Let us see what the history of this practice in the United States is. Here is the act of the 17th of July, 1862, which declares in its thirteenth section:

> That the President is hereby authorized at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof pardon and amnesty.

"Pardon" would be an unnecessary word except from the technical nature of a pardon. It is supposed to be by a specific instrument addressed to a named and specific person, but pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions, and at such times, and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare. Congress at that time was under the impression (and so was the President, for he approved the bill) that that was suitable legislation. If he acted upon it, it did not necessarily diminish his constitutional power to act without it; but it was merely conferring upon him an unnecessary power, to speak in the ordinary sense of the term. It did not do any harm, and it made absolutely secure the persons who received the benefit of a proclamation by classifications and on conditions as distinguished from the persons who received a private and particular deed of pardon from the Executive. That was the object. That is the object of this provision.

My learned friend says that it is open to very grave question whether the President under his constitutional authority, passing from the question of amnesty to his constitutional power to pardon, can make a conditional pardon that is lawful, on the payment of a sum of money. If it were a payment to him, it of course would be corrupt. It would be void for that reason, and he would be impeachable beside; but that of course is not what we are speaking of.

Mr. HOAR. Not necessarily void; it might be voidable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist upon it that it would be necessarily void for that reason, because it would be an act corrupt in its nature on both sides. But I do no not wish to spend the time of the Senate in discussing what that might be. The circumstance that the President of the United States under his power to pardon, leaving the question of amnesty now, has the authority to grant a conditional pardon has passed beyond the range of ordinary discussion in this country, for the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of ex parte Wells, reported in 18 Howard, 307, decided that the President did have power to grant a conditional pardon; and then a long series of other decisions, too numerous to waste your time, sir, in referring to, goes to show that this power of conditional pardon, either before conviction or after, under the Constitution of the United States—I know there are some decisions in some States that it must be after, but I think that is not the law of the United States—that this power of conditional pardon, like every other great public act that the Chief Magistrate of a nation under a constitutional government does, depends for its validity upon the great public considerations that led him to do it. If he does it privately, corruptly, wickedly, wrongly, by methods to which the pardoned party is also an accessory or in which he is a participant, then it would be void, I think, for obvious reasons. I do not care to go into that; but it being a great public power, it has been decided and settled, as I think justly, that it is a power which may be exercised conditionally.

That is what this bill provides. We leave to the Chief Magistrate that discretion, just as in a great many instances concerning other public affairs, embargoes and so on, that have arisen in regard to our foreign relations, we have done. We have confided to the President of the United States a discretion to act upon public affairs affecting private interests, because all public affairs do, according to certain limited discretions that the law may point out to him. So I think, with great respect to the Senator from Massachusetts that—supposing this provision to be necessary at all, which is open to question and we only put it in because it is open to question—it is competent to clothe the President by this act with the same power of exerting a discretion that he has under the Constitution in regard to a technical pardon, by imposing conditions in his discretion.

Mr. BAYARD. I suppose that no regulation by Congress can affect the prerogative of a distinct and independent branch of this Government. I have not the slightest idea that Congress can impose conditions upon the grant of the pardoning power, or that they can prescribe conditions under which the pardon shall vest its full force and effect in the recipient. I think what the Senator from Vermont has said really contains the germ and truth of the proposition before us. The only question about it is whether it is superfluous or not; whether there is any use in Congress suggesting to the President that he may do that which is his function alone, which rests in his discretion alone, which is vested in him alone. It would seem by a bare statement of the proposition to be a mere superfluity of legislation to say that the President has the power of pardon and he may exercise it under certain conditions; for whatever Congress may say upon the subject they cannot enlarge or diminish the power of the President over the question.

But there is one matter that affected me in giving my attention to this proposition. The question we are dealing with is very grave, and has interested public opinion, and what I may call the conscience of the people of this country. The class of offenses are very many in number and very different in their facts; and the suggestion intended is that so far as Congress is concerned there is no disposition to persecute or prosecute for that which has happened in the past; that just so far as there can be an indication of the Congress of the United States it is to say to all of this class of supposed offenders, "Sin no more and the consequences of the past shall not be visited upon you by prosecutions." That is all I think that was intended, and that is the full force that can be reached by any suggestion of the Congress of the United States to the Executive as to the exercise of his own special prerogatives.

I do take it as a proposition that can scarcely be stated too broadly or too confidently, that the Congress of the United States have nothing to do by way of enlargement or diminution with the pardoning power of the Executive, or for that matter any other power that is his by the Constitution; but I think it is proper, in view of the subject-matter of this legislation, that there should be a Congressional opinion of policy, of sentiment, in respect of this class of offenders; and that just so far as Congress may express the opinion they will have done it by this enactment, that they should be the subjects of executive clemency; and then follows the very natural and necessary language, "on such conditions and under such limitations as he shall think proper," not such as Congress may impose. I think it is therefore the suggestion of the spirit in which this law is to be enacted and the spirit in which it is to be executed, which is one of mercy and forgiveness and not of prosecution for the past.

Mr. HOAR. Then I understand the honorable Senator from Delaware, who is a member of the committee that reported the bill, to say that believing Congress cannot constitutionally extend or diminish the power of the President to grant pardon or amnesty, and cannot confer upon him any authority which he has not now, he still is in favor of an enactment which says the President is hereby authorized to grant amnesty.

Mr. BAYARD. I think it is brutum fulmen, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. GARLAND. When section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution conferred upon the President the power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment, it was supposed by a good many persons, and it has been ever since that time supposed, that that was a limitation upon the power of the President to pardon as to particular and individual cases. It has been contended in this country that the President had no power to grant amnesty in the strict sense of the word; that the power to grant amnesty as distinct from the power to grant reprieves and pardons was in Congress. That being so, after the late war between the States, when the pardoning power was called into exercise frequently, the Congress of the United States vested in the President the power to grant amnesty under certain conditions by the act of the 17th of July, 1862. That has been frequently done, and proclamations of that character have been issued heretofore by several Presidents. For example, President Washington by proclamation pardoned the whisky insurrectionists in Western Pennsylvania; President Adams pardoned the Northampton insurrectionists. Charles the Second issued a general proclamation of pardon from Breda, reserving to Parliament the right to make exceptions at its discretion. But general pardons, as stated by the Senator from Vermont, are commonly made by acts of Parliament. President Johnson, in 1868, issued a general proclamation of full pardon and amnesty. The effect of such a pardon is established by precedent and authority. Following the precedents set by Washington and by Adams, Mr. Lincoln on the 8th of December, 1863, issued such a proclamation, and also on the 26th of March, 1864; and President Johnson issued such a proclamation September 7, 1867. Some of these proclamations were issued by law and some without law.

But meeting the fact in the face that here is a contested point whether the President can grant amnesty, or whether Congress must not do it by classes, as distinguished from the pardoning power of the President conferred by section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution, the committee deemed it its duty to make it perfectly plain and put it beyond any cavil, and to authorize the President, so as to remove all doubt, to grant this pardon, or this amnesty, as it would be in a class of cases. Congress having the authority to do it unquestionably, both by the Constitution generally, and then by the power given under another clause of the Constitution to Congress to make all rules and regulations needful for the government of the Territories, there can be no doubt that Congress may place that power by this general section in the President of the United States to the same extent that Congress had itself, and on the same conditions that Congress could exercise it the President may exercise this authority under an act of Congress conferring the power on him.

It is elementary law that the President in the exercise of the pardoning power, distinctively speaking, can put conditions upon a pardon. He has done it repeatedly in this country. He did it in a case in which your humble servant was the beneficiary of a pardon. All the pardons issued at that time were conditional pardons—upon taking an oath of allegiance to the United States, and upon surrendering a certain species of property which the persons had, and swearing that they never would own it again. The effect of that pardon is set forth fully in the decision of the Supreme Court in 4th Wallace's Reports. Congress having that power to grant amnesty, the President having that power to impose conditions under a distinctive feature of the pardoning power, it seems a clear proposition that it can be given by this act, and that is all that it is intended to do. I do not see any difficulty in either one of the propositions suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary will be read.

The ACTING SECRETARY. In section 7, line 1, it is proposed to strike out "plural" and insert "bigamous or polygamous," so as to read "that the issue of bigamous or polygamous marriages known as Mormon marriages, in cases," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 7, line 6, to strike out "November" and insert "January," and in line 7 to strike out "79" and insert "83," so as to read "such issue shall have been born before the 1st day of January, A. D. 1883, are hereby legitimated."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 7, line 7, after the word "legitimated," to strike out the words "and shall be entitled to all the rights of heirs and next to kin of their parents."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as an additional section:

SEC. 8. That no polygamist, bigamist, or any person cohabiting with more than one woman, and no woman cohabiting with any of the persons described as aforesaid in this section, in any Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, shall be entitled to vote at any election held in any such Territory or other place, or be eligible for election or appointment to or be entitled to hold any office or place of public trust, honor, or emolument in, under, or for any such Territory or place, or under the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That requires a comma after the words "appointment to" in line 7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A comma will be inserted after the word "to." The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to add:

SEC. 9. That all the registration and election offices of every description in the Territory of Utah are hereby declared vacant, and each and every duty relating to the registration of voters, the conduct of elections, the receiving or rejection of votes, and the canvassing and returning of the same, and the issuing of certificates or other evidence of election in said Territory, shall, until other provision be made by the Legislative Assembly of said Territory as is hereinafter by this section provided, be performed under the existing laws of the United States and of said Territory by proper persons, who shall be appointed to execute such offices and perform such duties by a board of five persons, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, all of whom shall not be members of one political party, a majority of whom shall be a quorum. The members of said board so appointed by the President shall each receive a salary at the rate of $3,000 per annum, and shall continue in office until the Legislative Assembly of said Territory shall make provision for filling said offices as herein authorized. The secretary of the Territory shall be the secretary of said board, and keep a journal of its proceedings, and attest the action of said board under this section. The canvass and return of all the votes at elections in said Territory for members of the Legislative Assembly thereof shall also be returned to said board, which shall canvass all such returns and issue certificates of election to those persons who, being eligible for such election, shall appear to have been lawfully elected, which certificates shall be the only evidence of the right of such persons to sit in such Assembly; but each house of such Assembly, after its organization, shall have power to decide upon the elections and qualifications of its members. And at, or after the first meeting of said Legislative Assembly whose members shall have been elected and returned according to the provisions of this act, said Legislative Assembly may make such laws, conformable to the organic act of said Territory and not inconsistent with other laws of the United States, as it shall deem proper concerning the filling of offices in said Territory declared vacant by this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the word "and" should be before "a" in line 15, so as to read "and a majority of whom shall be a quorum;" and after the word "party," in line 15, the comma should be a semicolon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified if there be no objection.

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend the amendment of the committee in line 14 by striking out the word "all" and inserting in its place "not more than three;" and by striking out the word "not" at the end of the line; so as to read:

A board of five persons, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not more than three of whom shall be members of one political party.

As it now stands the President might appoint four Democrats and one Republican or four Republicans and one Democrat. As amended it would require the appointees to be three to two, which I think would be a better rule for us to adopt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is of very little practical consequence probably, but I confess that I am opposed on principle to putting anything about political parties into any law whatever. Still, out of deference to the views of my brethren in the committee, I consented to this provision, which follows the famous jury bill that we passed three or four years ago, preventing the jury commissioners from being composed all of one political party, to give some other one political party some representation. Now I think to carry it still further and say that there should be only three of one party is putting the thing up to a pitch that is quite unnecessary for the objects to be attained and seems to rather intensify in our legislation—which I should be very glad to get rid of—the idea that in regard to the administration of the law, there can be any differences or distinctions or requirements as it regards the political opinions of common citizens of a common republic. So, then, with great respect to my friend from Georgia, I rather hope the Senate will not agree to make it any more intense than it is now.

Mr. BROWN. In reply to the remarks of my friend from Vermont, I have to state that it may be a question as to the propriety of saying anything about political parties in a bill of this character, but it seems on mature consideration the Judiciary Committee thought it would be proper that there should be some division of these five persons who are to act as commissioners, and have, you may say, absolute control of matters in the Territory, and they have gone so far as to provide in effect that there may be one person belonging to the opposition party. Now, if we recognize party distinctions at all, it seems to me that it is proper we divide a little more fairly or make it as nearly equal as we can between the political parties. Therefore I should think it would be quite appropriate that there be three belonging to the dominant party and two belonging to the minority party.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would just as lief have three of the minority party.

Mr. BROWN. I care not which way, but if it is proper to divide it under the circumstances, if there should be a division, it should be divided as nearly equal as possible. In the case of persons appointed to superintend elections in different cities, there is another instance where Congress has expressly provided for a representation of both political parties. Here I think it is appropriate, for this is a political matter. These five persons are really the government of Utah substantially during the time they act. I think they ought to be divided.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the political cases to which my friend has very properly referred, I think he will find that the law is just like this, that it only requires that each party shall have a representation, and does not regulate the degree of representation.

Mr. BROWN. But there are only two; so that there is one of each party.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Sometimes it is three. In the State of New York, for instance, there are several instances of particular commissions that are regulated in this way, I think the provision is the negative one, that they shall not be all of one side.

Mr. BROWN. My recollection is that there are two commissioners at each election precinct, one of each political party.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is where there are two commissioners.

Mr. BROWN. I want the same principle of equality here, as near as we can have it, as this is a political matter in which the Government is involved.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not the Government, it is only a body of people who have one single function to perform, and that is to see to it that the returns are honestly made, and that the regulating power by the senior justice of the peace as it is now in the Territory of Utah, that is the dominant power at each precinct, shall be put into the hands of a person who under the law, if this passes, is eligible to hold office himself and to vote and to conduct that election.

Now I shall be very glad, and I am rejoiced to state it here publicly, if this bill becomes a law, if the President of the United States will appoint three Republicans and two Democrats to these five places; and I shall not be sorry if he appoints three Democrats and two Republicans, because I do not care at all in this question which does not enter into party politics what their opinions are.

Mr. TELLER. How about Mormons?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not want a Mormon who was under the condemnation of this act, exactly, for he is excluded if there is anything in the act at all, but I should not have the slightest objection, and I should hope the President would appoint one monogamous Mormon who was honestly a monogamist. I should be glad to see him do that, because the object is to endeavor to redeem this Territory from the absolute domination that 2,000 polygamists there have over everything that is done by law and without law in that Territory. That is what I wish to accomplish.

Mr. BROWN. As to the point made by the Senator from Vermont, that this is not the government of Utah, let me say that it is virtually a returning board, and I have always found in the South that the returning board is the government of the State. They always really decide elections there one way, and I think it will be so here. I have no doubt that the Senator states very candidly his opinion that he will be willing to see a majority of either party represented on this board, and would like to see three Republicans and two Democrats or two Republicans and three Democrats. I simply desire, as we are referring to parties here, that we put it in the act that it shall be that way, three to two.

Mr. CALL. It seems to me that this measure is one which ought not to be adopted by the Senate. It is an act which virtually declares that the President may give the whole political power of elections in the Territory of Utah to five persons nominated by himself and confirmed by the Senate. It seems to me that if there is anything in the institutions of this country and in the idea of self-government, that is a proposition which destroys the whole of it. It is simply a proposition to give to five persons nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate absolute power not only of deciding who is capable of voting, but of deciding who is eligible to election.

That all the registration and election offices of every description in the Territory of Utah are hereby declared vacant, and each and every duty relating to the registration of voters, the conduct of elections, the receiving or rejection of votes, and the canvassing and returning of the same, and the issuing of certificates or other evidence of election in said Territory, shall, until other provision be made by the Legislative Assembly of said Territory as is hereinafter by this section provided, be performed under the existing laws of the United States and of said Territory by proper persons, who shall be appointed to execute such offices and perform such duties by a board of five persons, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, all of whom shall not be members of one political party, and a majority of whom shall be a quorum.

* * * * * * *

The canvass and return of all the votes at elections in said Territory for members of the Legislative Assembly thereof shall also be returned to said board, which shall canvass all such returns and issue certificates of election to those persons who, being eligible for such election, shall appear to have been lawfully elected, which certificates shall be the only evidence of the right of such persons to sit in such assembly.

Now, if the Senator from Vermont or the Committee on the Judiciary will report a bill by which it shall be declared "that five persons appointed by the President of the United States shall have absolute authority to interpret the election laws of the Territory of Utah and the laws of the United States, to declare what votes are valid and what are not, to declare who is eligible, exclusive of any judicial construction upon the subject, to hold office in that Territory, to issue certificates which shall alone be the evidence of eligibility to office," we shall have the proposition in its naked and proper form. For myself, sir, I can never vote for a provision which contains a power of this discretion in defiance of the popular will, based entirely upon five persons selected by the executive power of the country. I think you can find better means of stamping out polygamy than one which stamps out the institutions of the country, the rights contained in the Constitution, the distinction between judicial, legislative, and executive powers, and which by a plain enactment here gives to five persons nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, all of whom except one may be of one political party, absolute power not only of deciding who shall be voters, but also of deciding what votes are cast and who shall be eligible to office. I am opposed, for one, to the section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I may be pardoned for a single moment—I wish to finish this bill in a few minutes—I desire to call the attention of my distinguished friend from Florida to the fact that the Territories of the United States are well understood to be under the legislative power of the United States, not even limited by the Constitution as applied to the States.

Mr. CALL. Will my honorable friend allow me to interrupt him for a moment? Does my honorable friend understand or mean to say that the powers of this board of five persons will be legislative authority of the United States?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I do not mean to say any such thing. I mean to say the reverse, that the legislative power is now endeavoring to provide for the execution of some powers in the Territory by authority of law. Then I wish to call his attention, because his argument is entitled to great consideration undoubtedly, and the committee considered it, to the fact that every time we organize a Territory, in order to start its machinery we provide (as we did in the case of Utah by the act of 1850 when the Democratic party was in power) that for the first election the governor alone should be the supreme judge as to how the election should be conducted and should be the supreme authority to declare who had been elected to the Territorial Assembly. Now, on the theory of the committee that here is a state of things that requires the legislative action of the sovereign authority to put the political power of that Territory for the self-government that it is authorized to have—because Congress has given it to them and not otherwise—into the hands of those who are obedient to the law, and not to the hierarchy and the polygamists who are disobedient to it, we treat it as a reorganization of the Territorial Assembly; and therefore starting de novo, instead of leaving it to the governor of that Territory as we did in the first instance, we require the President and the Representatives of all the States to agree upon five persons to whom shall be intrusted the execution of the power of conducting one election.

Mr. CALL. I will ask my honorable friend from Vermont if it would not be equally competent for the judicial power appointed by the United States to decide who was ineligible to office as that board of five persons, and if it would not be more consonant to the character of our institutions to allow eligibility to office to be decided by the judges of the United States courts appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, we leave it to the Territorial Assembly itself the moment it is organized to rejudge over the heads of this board as to the qualifications of every person who claims to sit there. This machinery is only for the time being in order to get a Legislature organized.

Mr. CALL. I would reply to my honorable friend by saying that that is precisely my objection. It is a subterfuge of creating an assembly which has been done before and elsewhere—creating an assembly of a particular kind by these five persons to really say who shall be the legislature, or allowing them to pass upon this subject.

I have no objection to your stamping out polygamy; I should like to see it done. I will join hands in that very gladly. But it seems to me that it would be much better to leave the question of eligibility to office and the questions of the proper application of the disqualifications that may be prescribed upon electors (which it is only competent for Congress to do) to the courts of the United States, rather than leave it to a board of five persons appointed by the Executive authority, and giving them that function which belongs to the judicial tribunals of deciding whether or not the laws are properly applied. The answer of my honorable friend from Vermont, that a legislature, the creature of this improper proceeding, this unrepublican mode of proceeding, will have the power to revise its action is of no avail, because it will be a packed legislature, and not a fair expression of the public will of the people; and hence I object to it. I am willing to see the disqualification of polygamy made a condition of electoral capacity, but I do not think that the power of the courts should be taken away and the whole of this reconstruction vested in a board of five persons appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have only a word in reply, for I will not take up time. I repeat that the power of the courts that they have ever had or exercised in that Territory or anywhere else, except in a very few of the States, and then merely as a preliminary power, is not interfered with at all. The power of the courts over the question of the election of a member of Congress or a member of a State Legislature or a Territorial Legislature has never existed. It is the legislature, it is the body itself that has that power; and when this Territory was organized, as we propose to reorganize it on a little more pure footing than it now stands, one man alone, not a judge, was made the dominant determinator of every one of these preliminary questions. We now make five, and then, the Territorial Legislature being organized, allow them, as is usual in all such cases, to retry and rejudge the question. As to the qualifications of electors, this board of five people are not by this bill vested with any powers at all; they are left exactly where they are left by the other laws of the United States.

Mr. CALL. I have only one word to say. The section says, "which shall canvass all such returns and issue certificates of election to those persons who, being eligible for such election," &c. That certainly gives the board the discretion, the quasi-judicial discretion, of deciding who are eligible and of not giving certificates to any other persons.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. CALL. It is true that courts have never had, and ought not to have, the right of deciding who have been elected to the Legislature or to Congress; but they have always, I believe, had the authority of deciding in the first instance in regard to the conditions of law which make a person eligible. It is true Congress has the absolute authority to decide and admit whom it pleases; but I take it the proper interpretation of the law in regard to eligibility was never before committed, either to the body itself or to an irresponsible board.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I should share the feeling of repugnance exhibited by the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] toward what he very justly calls an unrepublican theory of proceeding in regard to elections or allowing a people to go through the forms of exercising their right of choice, and yet to have that virtually subjected to the unlimited discretion of five or more individuals; but I have been constrained, with some degree of reluctance, to approve of this provision and for this reason: under the forms of republican government, so far as they have been delegated by Congress in making needful rules and regulations for the government of this Territory, the spirit and the fact of republican government has been displaced by another. The government of Utah has to-day no semblance to republican government. It is a theocracy; it is a theocratic government, with the mere name and form of such republican doctrine as Congress chose to place in its organic act. All that was intended to be conserved of republican institutions and theory has been displaced by a system of theocracy. And therefore for the purpose of obtaining the spirit and meaning and principle of republican government it is necessary that that theocracy shall be displaced. How are you to do it? You can do it by repealing every law upon your statute-book that gives a Territorial government to this Territory; that is in the power of Congress unquestionably. They can repeal all the laws; they can absolutely annihilate all statutory and other government for the Territory. Now the question simply is whether this bill is or is not a needful rule and regulation for the proper and wise government of that Territory; and you are to turn at this time the same machinery precisely that in countless cases you have employed for the purpose of setting in motion a Territorial government under republican forms. There must be a beginning. In this case there is necessity for what I may call a rebeginning. That which was intended to be an inchoate republican State promises now to be a mere theocratic State. How are you to meet it? By making needful rules and regulations within the discretion and the constitutional power of Congress.

Now, can it be denied that upon the organization originally of a Territorial government, the machinery of elections, the control of those elections by means of commissioners and boards of canvass, could be exercised by Congress? If so, why can it not be now? I think my friend from Florida will agree that if this were a case of the original organization of a Territory it would be competent in Congress to pass precisely the section now under consideration.

Mr. CALL. I will say in answer to my friend from Delaware, if he will allow me, that I do not doubt the competency of Congress, the power of Congress, to establish any form of government in the Territory of Utah, or any other Territory; but I hold that it is in duty bound to establish a government in accordance with the principles and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. I concede that fully, and I have no doubt that the same principle which found its expression in the Constitution in regard to States, that the Government of the Union shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government, although not in words applied to Territories, should nevertheless control and formulate the legislation of Congress in dealing with Territories. Territories are inchoate States—inchoate republican States. There can be none but republics in this Union of States. And should the government of a State be ever overthrown, as if a monarchy were set up in a State, there can be no question as to the guarantee of the power of the Union to rectify that and restore that State to the condition of a republic.

Now, the question before the American people and before the great bar of public opinion and public justice—for this is a grave matter; we are dealing with a people distant from us and who are entitled to rights that we should respect as much in them as in ourselves—the question is, does there the semblance or the fact of a republican government exist in that Territory? What is there in government? What are the real forces? Is it the Constitution of the United States and its laws, or is it the laws and the constitution of the Mormon Church? Does any man hesitate to answer that question? Does any man in the Senate not know that the government of Utah is the government of the Mormon Church; that it is a theocracy as perfect as ever existed on the globe? Does any man say that that is republican in theory, in doctrine, or in practice?

Now, under the forms and by the permission of the organic law of that Territory, framed under the forms of republican institutions, which are those of election by the people primarily, to be governed by their Representatives secondarily, all again controlled by the revisory power of Congress, can it be doubted that a body of citizens have occupied that Territory and by their own submission to a power higher, a dominating power, not that of the law, not that of the Constitution, but of a religious form of government, a church of whose doctrines it is not necessary to speak—I mean not to speak of them in discussing this principle—but that under the forms of law, the organic law of that Territory, every principle of civil and religious and constitutional liberty for the preservation of which this Government was ordained, has been displaced by an arbitrary, tyrannical, absolute government, based upon a supposed or a miscalled theocracy.

Now, I say as a legal proposition, that if Congress could originally in organizing a Territory provide by law for the machinery of casting the votes, receiving the votes, counting the votes, and declaring the result, they can as legitimately do so for the purpose of restoring republican government to that body of people, no matter from what cause or by what it has been displaced, as they could enact it originally.

I am not speaking so much now of the precise merits of the form of this bill, whether or not you want more commissioners differently appointed, or what. The question is on the facts before the country, whether it is competent for Congress in exercising its confessed constitutional power of making all needful rules and regulations for the government of this Territory to provide to meet a state of facts which is based upon the assumption that a republican form of government has been driven out of that Territory, and that you seek to replace it by another in consonance with our own forms. I hold that Congress has the power. For that reason I think that the objection to the amendment on constitutional grounds is not well taken.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I concur in the view expressed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] as to the present form of government in Utah and the institution of polygamy as there practiced. About that there will be no sort of question; but let us be very careful that in our abhorrence of this institution, which, in my judgment, strikes at the foundation of all society and of all morality throughout the country, we do not strike down the safeguards of personal liberty, personal rights, and republican institutions.

When the seventh section of this bill was read my attention was not attracted, or else I should have called the attention of the Senate at that time to its phraseology and stated my objection to its enactment. The seventh and eighth sections of this bill simply provide for an anomaly in the jurisprudence of the United States and establish a doctrine that, in my judgment, strikes down the fundamental principle of American liberty. If there is one single clause in our Constitution or bill of rights dear to the American heart, it is that no citizen shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without the judgment of his peers or of a competent tribunal. The idea that any citizen can have taken from him a right conferred by law, without the judgment of a competent tribunal and without a trial, is abhorrent to every principle of personal liberty and constitutional right. It is the very essence of good government and of freedom and of constitutional right that every man should be tried and convicted before punishment. The seventh section of this bill takes away from a citizen of the United States the right to vote or hold office before conviction by his peers of any crime.

The Senator from Delaware is pleased to say that this case is analogous to that of a Territory applying for admission into the Union, when Congress has the right under the Constitution to impose its own terms and form of government under the Constitution. But, sir, there is no analogy. The people of Utah to-day are voters; the people of Utah to-day are office-holders; they have had this right from the organization of the Territory.

Mr. BAYARD. By act of Congress.

Mr. VEST. By act of Congress under the Constitution; and under the Constitution I say that no man can be deprived of the right to vote or to hold office except after conviction. I announce that proposition to-day. If Utah were here applying for admission into the Union then we could say to her, "Accept certain conditions;" and if they were within the limitations of the Constitution those conditions of course must be accepted or rejected. But here these rights have been conferred; they are already given; and we propose by a commission outside of the law, outside of the Constitution, to give its members the power to say absolutely who shall be elected, what shall be the returns, to canvass the returns, and to declare who shall be the voters and who shall be elected. Such power inside of American legislation was never known before.

But, Mr. President, I say as a lawyer that the principle of taking away the right of suffrage or the right to hold office before conviction for crime is unknown in the legislation of this country or in its jurisprudence. In a case in 3 Cowen this doctrine was announced by the Supreme Court of New York, ay, sir, by no tyro in our profession, by no embryo lawyer, but by a man who graced the bench and the tribunal over which he presided, by John Savage. The Legislature of New York undertook to stamp out dueling, and provided that any man who should fight a duel should be deprived of the right to vote or to hold office. The case was taken to the highest tribunal in the State and adjudicated. I wish I had time to read it all, for every word of it is applicable to the case now before the Senate. I will simply read as much of it as constitutes the syllabus:

But while many rights are consecrated as universal and inviolable, the right of eligibility to office is not so secured. It is not one of the express rules of the Constitution, and is not declared as a right or mentioned in terms as a principle in any part of the instrument. Important as this right is, it stands, as the right to life itself stands, subject to the general power of the Legislature over crimes and punishments. (Barker vs. The People, 3 Cowen, p. 706.)

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this bill inflicts a punishment for crime on any man guilty of polygamy, or any person cohabiting with more than one woman, &c., by providing that he shall be deprived of the right to vote and the right to hold office. A subsequent section provides that five gentlemen constituting a commission shall determine that question. I say that this bill comes within the meaning of this decision, for it is the infliction of a punishment for crime.

As a right flowing from the Constitution, it cannot be taken away by any law declaring that classes of men, or even a single person not convicted of a public offense, shall be ineligible to public stations; but as a right not expressly secured by the Constitution, it may be taken from convicted criminals when the Legislature in their plenary power over crimes deem such a deprivation a necessary punishment. To say this, is to say in substance that the right in question may be forfeited by crimes, when the Legislature so directs. If this right is taken from none but malefactors, in punishment for offenses declared by law, and ascertained in the due course of justice, the sense of the whole Constitution is maintained; and the public, it may be presumed, will not find their choice of agents much abridged by the exclusions from office, which their own legislators, courts, and juries may thus add to those specified in the Constitution. (Barker vs. The People, 3 Cowen, 707.)

I think there can be but one answer to that argument and to that decision, and I know of no decision in the jurisprudence of the United States which has ever declared, under any constitution, State or national, that the right of suffrage or the right to hold office, after being conferred, can be taken away before conviction. But if there be any answer in the whole range of probability or conjecture, it must be that the Territories are outside of the Constitution of the United States. I do not mean to say that the Senator from Delaware so declared, but he went very far toward declaring that the Territories could be governed absolutely by Congress as it pleased. Mr. President, it is an arbitrary and despotic and unconstitutional declaration.

The Territories of the United States are peopled by citizens of the United States, and I say to-day that the highest judicial declaration, in my judgment, ever made by the Supreme Court of the United States was made by the late Chief Justice Taney when he declared that the Constitution of the national Government and the citizen walked into the Territories side by side under the Constitution of our common country. This idea that the Territories are absolute creatures to be governed by Congress as they please, without reference to the Constitution or law or right is, in my judgment, abhorrent to every principle of American freedom.

In the Dred Scott case, which I mention to evoke no partisan feeling—death has sealed already the voices and the passions that surrounded this decision when made, but the character of the great lawyers who participated in it will live forever—Chief-Justice Taney said in regard to the power of Congress over the Territories:

> But the power of Congress over the person or property of a citizen can never be a mere discretionary power under our Constitution and form of government. The powers of the Government and the rights and privileges of the citizen are regulated and plainly defined by the Constitution itself. And when the Territory becomes a part of the United States the Federal Government enters into possession in the character impressed upon it by those who created it. It enters upon it with its powers over the citizen strictly defined and limited by the Constitution, from which it derives its own existence, and by virtue of which alone it continues to exist and act as a government and sovereignty. It has no power of any kind beyond it, and it cannot when it enters a Territory of the United States put off its character and assume discretionary or despotic powers which the Constitution has denied to it. It cannot create for itself a new character separated from the citizens of the United States, and the duties it owes them under the provisions of the Constitution. The Territory being a part of the United States, the Government and the citizen both enter it under the authority of the Constitution—

Letters of gold; letters which declare the essence of the Constitution and the rights of every American citizen—> with their respective rights defined and marked out, and the Federal Government can exercise no power over his person or property beyond what that instrument confers, nor lawfully deny any right which it has reserved. (Dred Scott vs. Sandford, 19 Howard, page 449.)

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the Senator to maintain that a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court on that occasion held that it was not within the competence of Congress to abolish slavery in the Territory of Kansas or wherever that question arose?

Mr. VEST. I hold that a majority of the Supreme Court in this decision held to the doctrine which is announced here by Chief-Justice Taney, that the Constitution of the United States extended over the Territories, the people of the Territories, their persons, and their property, as it did over citizens of the States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good; but I ask the Senator only to have the kindness to give me his opinion whether he understands that decision to amount to saying that it was not within the constitutional power of Congress, if they had chosen to do so, to abolish slavery in that Territory?

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, I hardly think they did; but that is not this question; it has nothing to do with this argument, as I am making it. I would like to ask the Senator from Vermont if he believes that a citizen of a State in this Union can have the right of suffrage or the right to hold office taken away from him before conviction?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think he can; by a change of the constitution of his State he may be disfranchised and deprived of a right to vote that he had before. Now, if the Congress have the same dominating power over the inhabitants of a Territory that the people in a State have over themselves, they can change the right to hold office, &c., just as the States do by their constitutions. That is the whole of it.

Mr. VEST. But that does not answer my question. The Senator says now it may be done if the constitution of the State so provides; but I put the question to him, if there was no constitutional provision in a State, could the Congress of the United States exercise any such power as that? Could the right of a citizen of a State be infringed in that sort of way, and can the right of a citizen of a Territory?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is perfectly plain that Congress has no power over the qualifications of voters in the States because the Constitution explicitly declares that, so far as the United States have anything to do with that matter at all, and that is as to members of Congress, the qualifications of the voters shall be those of voters for the most numerous branch of the Legislatures of the States.

Mr. VEST. I understand that; but can the constitution of a State take away from one of its own citizens the right to hold office or the right to vote, before conviction?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say most unquestionably it can, and it always has every time a State constitution, more or less, according to the judgment of the constitution makers, has affected the disqualification of voters and the holding of office by enlarging or diminishing as it may be. That is the fact. It does not regard the question of offense; it fixes the status of the people who are to enter into the political power of that government and that body of people by their constitution, because they are a people and have a right to say from time to time by their constitution who shall vote in their government.

Mr. VEST. When they fix that by a constitution or a legal enactment it applies to future offenses and not to those that have already been committed. The proposition I put is that this bill takes away from the people of Utah a right, already conferred, as a punishment for past offenses, and this without conviction. I affirm that what the Senator from Vermont has said here is directly in contravention to the decision of the supreme court of New York and, so far as I know, of the unbroken current of judicial authority in this country. Here is the plain, unvarnished provision that these people shall be deprived of the right of suffrage and the right of holding office before any trial. No trial at all is provided. The provision in the seventh section is:

> That no polygamist, bigamist, or any person cohabiting with more than one woman, and no woman cohabiting with any of the persons described as aforesaid in this section, in any Territory or other place over which the United States have exclusive jurisdiction, shall be entitled to vote at any election held in any such Territory or other place, or be eligible for election or appointment to or be entitled to hold any office or place of public trust, honor, or emolument in, under, or for any such Territory or place, or under the United States.

Who is to adjudge that? Who is to say whether they have been guilty or not? In the next section it is provided, and without saying who shall pass upon the rights of voters at the polls, that the returns of all elections shall be passed upon by five gentlemen appointed by the President, not a court, not a judicial tribunal, but a quasi-judicial tribunal with full and unlimited power, without the right of appeal. Much as I detest polygamy, much as I believe it to be utterly subversive of all pure society and good morals, I shall never vote for a provision which, in my judgment, subverts the highest and dearest rights of every American citizen.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and also the argument of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] goes somewhat to the foundation of this bill. Both those Senators have said that the provisions of section 7 and section 8 are severe provisions. They were intended to be severe. They have been said to be rough provisions. They were intended to be rough. Desperate cases need desperate remedies, and I am of the opinion that every provision in this bill is as well sanctioned by the organic law and precedents under the organic law of this country as any bill that has ever received the sanction of Congress.

By my education, as well as my personal experience which has been sad and bitter, I abhor and detest measures of tyranny and measures that are rough and severe and against the theory of our government, as much as any living man; but if the Senate will indulge me a few moments I will give my reasons for stating thus broadly that this bill, which seems to be severe in its operation, is a law sanctioned by the precedents and the organic law of this country.

Mr. President, what are we undertaking to do? We are undertaking to provide for a government in the Territory of Utah. What Territory? One of the Territories of the United States. We are not undertaking to legislate for a State; we are not undertaking to reconstruct a State that has already been rehabilitated; but we are undertaking to legislate for the government of a distant Territory of the United States. Where do we get that power? We get it under the following provision of the Constitution:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

The Senator from Missouri is correct when he says that the Constitution goes into the Territories. It goes in and enters into the Territories by virtue of this very provision in the Constitution which gives Congress power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories. What now has the highest tribunal of the land said is the relative position of these Territories to the United States under that grant of power? A case that has been followed repeatedly by no divided court, by no individual opinion merely, but followed repeatedly—it is the fountain of the authority as construed by the Supreme Court—the case of Gratiot vs. The United States, in 14 Peters:

> The term territory as here used—

That is, as used in the clause of the Constitution I have just read—> is merely descriptive of one kind of property, and is equivalent to the word "lands." And Congress has the same power over it as over any other property belonging to the United States, and this power is vested in Congress without limitation, and has been considered the foundation upon which the Territorial governments rest.

And no other. You cannot place your hand upon this Territory without this grant of power; you cannot legislate for it in one form or another without this grant of power or some similar grant; and upon this grant of power, says the Supreme Court, rests your Territorial government. That is the law of this land. That being so, what are your Territorial governments? Under a law that has been in force for many years, section 1850 of the Revised Statutes, it is provided:

> All laws passed by the Legislative Assembly and governor of any Territory, except in the Territories of Colorado, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming shall be submitted to Congress, and, if disapproved, shall be null and of no effect.

And on several occasions since I have been in the Senate, Congress has disapproved of acts of the Territories and set them aside under this section 1850.

So the legislative acts of the Territories have no force and effect save and only as Congress acquiesces in them. The very law under which we have been living for many years submits the legislative acts of these Territories to our disapproval, and they are laws there now only by the grace of Congress; they are operative laws only because Congress does not see proper to repeal them or to disapprove of them. Ten thousand people in Utah Territory vote. They vote by the sanction of Congress; they vote by reason of the non-repeal, the non-disapproval by it of the Territorial acts giving them the franchise. Certainly, if that be the case, it is within the power of Congress to repeal them whenever it sees proper, and that is what we are undertaking to do in this bill.

I labored under the impression once that you could not disfranchise any person in this country, and I sat up at nights committing to memory that glowing article which Alexander Hamilton wrote on that subject, holding that you could not disfranchise a person who had once been enfranchised without his conviction of crime; and I attempted to make the Supreme Court see that, but they never could see it through the same glasses that I did. What did you do in your confiscation acts? How many people did you strike down and take property from, without trial by jury, under your confiscation acts, not in Territories, but in States? Whatever may be my individual opinion in reference to the decisions on those propositions as applicable to a State, they have no application in the Territories. Here by the Constitution, and by the construction of the Constitution, it is clear that your power is unlimited; more than that, under the acts under which these Territories are now living and operating by a law of Congress already passed, their Territorial enactments may be any time disapproved and rejected by Congress.

Then what is the proposition? The proposition reported rests on the basis that the Territory of Utah needs some new law; the Territory of Utah is not properly governed according to the opinions of many persons; and I have in my hand reports on that subject running back for fifteen years submitted in the two Houses of Congress, and without a dissenting voice it is the general judgment that there is something wrong in that Territory; that there is something there that defies the laws of this country; that there is something there that sets at naught mandates and edicts (if I may use that expression) of the two Houses of Congress approved and sanctioned by the President of the United States. An honored citizen of the State of the Senator from Missouri, some thirteen years since, made a report after personal inspection there that if another government was not substituted in that Territory the authority of the Army of the United States would have to be brought there. I shall not detain the Senate by reading these various reports, but I have them here in my hand made in both Houses.

The difficulty is not because a man has one, two, three, four, five, or ten wives or more; it arises not merely upon the morality or the virtue of that peculiar proceeding; but it is because he has a government there at war with the spirit and theory of the Government under which we live; he has a government there that bids defiance and stands not in awe of the laws passed by the Congress of the United States. Probably no law will ever be effective to prevent polygamy or polyandry there if you please, probably no law can ever be passed that can effectually prevent cohabitation; but yet I have in my hand the laws of every State and Territory of this Union except that one, and there is a severe penalty against that crime of cohabitation, bigamy, or whatever name you may choose to call it by. If they had a law there that the other Territories and the States have against these crimes, probably nothing need be said on this subject; but, as stated by the honorable Senator from Delaware, there is no republican government there, there is a hierarchy, a theocracy; it is a government bred and brought into life by an inspiration, according to the report of Mr. Cullem submitted in 1870, "by an independent revelation of God to Brigham Young." The marriages are held within the bosom of the Church there, all the property goes through the Church, the lands and the wills and everything else go through the same sanction of the Church. Tell me then that there is a republican government there!

The theory of our Government is that Church and State shall not be commingled, shall not be made to run together; and in the case of the United States vs. Reynolds, in 98 U. S. Supreme Court Reports, where Reynolds pleaded that he was only practicing his religion there and was not committing an indictable offense, the Supreme Court told him in plain language that the plea would not do in this country to shield a man under his religion to perpetrate these crimes which the civilized world denounces. It was from an inspiration I believe that Guiteau said he was impelled to take the life of the Chief Magistrate of this country and plunge this people in woe. Yes, you may have your religion, but you cannot have it as a cloak to commit crimes that the laws of the country say must be punished and put down and suppressed. Let it go to the world that that Territory is organized on the theory that a man can govern himself because he is inspired by God to a certain course, and you may as well abolish all your statute-books and dispense with your law-making power. When the Constitution spoke and when the theory of this Government spoke, and when Jefferson and the men of his day spoke on this subject, declaring that Church and State should not be mixed, it was not meant to give an authority to commit crime under the cloak and guise of religion by whatever name it might be called.

Our Constitution says that the United States shall guarantee to each State a government republican in form. What is the object and purpose of your Territories? They are now in their chrysalis state marching on to full sisterhood and to admission into the Union. Suppose now Utah was to be presented for admission into the Union, is there a Senator here present who could say that there is a republican form of government there? That is the test of this question. Suppose Utah now were to knock at the doors of Congress for admission, let us see what your Constitution says and what your practice under the Constitution is; let us see what you would say in reference to it. Its people might say "we only have four or five or six or ten wives apiece; we live in this kind of business at large, and everybody knows it is according to law; nobody can be punished for it; our property comes through the Church, and our rules and regulations are all from the Church." That is not a government carried on by the people through their representatives, which means a republican government—people who are guilty of crimes, as suggested to me by the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY,] which were punishable at common law at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and by all the States at the time they adopted it.

Now, it is in the power of Congress to say to these people "you shall not vote at all." We have seen that our power in that regard is ample, that it is plenary. When we speak of a man forfeiting a right, it is not a right of voting secured by the laws of the country, because that right is conferred by the law-making power and it is changed repeatedly by a change of law or constitution. That is not one of those guaranteed rights (as decided repeatedly by the Supreme Court) of which a man cannot be deprived without the intervention of a jury; but every State and every Territory in this Government disqualifies persons for certain things from sitting upon a jury. Aliens and felons shall not sit upon juries; persons under twenty-one years of age shall not, and yet they are taxed. True a felon is convicted; but look at all the laws of your different States and you will find that provisions as severe and as far-reaching as these apply to making up your jury boxes.

We cannot afford to stand here speaking of the rights of a Territory in these matters. Nor is it novel for the Congress of the United States to provide for a commission government in the Territories. Have we not provided a commission government for this District which is no more under the control of Congress than are the Territories by the Constitution of the United States and the decisions of the Supreme Court under the Constitution? Have you not taken away the right of suffrage from the people here in this District?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me to add to his suggestion about this District, he will remember at once—I merely recall it to his recollection—that in three or four instances of the Territories in the Northwest we governed them entirely by commission composed of the governor and judges.

Mr. GARLAND. And I had that instance before me to refer to. Without consuming time, it is recorded in Paschal's Digest that it was done over and over again. Congress can say whether it shall be done by one man or two men or more men; and this canvassing board is nothing more nor less than exists in many States, and has existed heretofore, and will I suppose hereafter in many, leaving it at last to the Legislative Assembly to pass on the election, qualifications, and returns of the members.

Mr. President, when we consider all these things, it occurs to me that this is a desperate case which requires desperate remedies. We are applying here what we have the right to apply; we are applying here what we have applied in other sections of the country. I say to the Senate of the United States to-day that it is utterly impossible for the government of Utah, with the practices prevailing there, to be a Republican government, or even to be that of a free monarchy; and it is upon this ground that I advocate this bill.

Now I wish to read a few words from Professor Heeren's Historical Researches. He is a professor who published some seven volumes of his own travels and researches in Asia and other countries. Here is a very instructive lesson, and one sentence contains the whole of this proposition. At page 17, under the head of "Asia," he says:

> No one who is aware how closely they are connected can deny the influence which the better or worse condition of the domestic relations has on those of the society at large. The popular saying, that a republic to be permanent must be founded on virtue, appears to be only a consequence of the more general principle that civil freedom is closely connected with morality, and that the one inevitably perishes with the other. Now there is no one custom more adverse to virtue in general, especially the domestic virtues, the chief sources of all true patriotism, than that of polygamy. By this many explain the phenomenon that no nation practicing polygamy has ever attained to a true republican constitution, nor even that of a free monarchy. Nay—

Here is the sentence that I wish Senators particularly to reflect on:

> Nay, it may be confidently asserted, that it would be unable to maintain a government of this kind even if presented with it.

It is at war with the very necessary elements of a free republic or of a free monarchy:

> Polygamy at once produces domestic tyranny, by making woman a slave and man a tyrant; and society at large thus becomes a combination, not of fathers of families, but of household tyrants, who, by the practice of tyranny, have been fitted to endure it. He who is tyrannical in authority will be abject in submission.

That, Mr. President, is the proposition at the bottom of this whole business. Here we have a Territory, anomalous as it may appear, directly at war and directly antagonistic to all the theories of our Government and at war with the principles of our Government. It is a Territory subject to our own control, under the needful rules and regulations we may think proper to make. Shall we hesitate to adopt this proposed law? If it is extreme, it is an extreme case upon which it is to operate.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, long before I took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, I studied its provisions, and though I have on more than one occasion taken an oath to support the Constitution, I have not omitted to study many things that are in it and still more that are not in it; and one thing that certainly is not in the Constitution is a prohibition against a Senator, like my honorable friend from Missouri, setting up a man of straw of his own and then vigorously knocking him down. It was with surprise and much regret that I found myself, by some strange misapprehension of the Senator from Missouri, held up to the Senate as declaring that the Congress of the United States could exercise an absolute and tyrannical government, free from all restraints of the Constitution, over an American citizen anywhere. Why, sir, it was a strange misapprehension. It was still stranger to be urged by the Senator from Missouri against me, for there had been enough, I trust, in the past of my life, in which he and his had concern, to know that there was no man in this country more tender, more solicitous, more jealous than I of any infringement of the rights of an American citizen who was sought to be disfranchised by an unjust and tyrannical law.

Mr. President, the grant of power to Congress to make needful rules and regulations for the territory of the United States is a very plenary grant, to be exercised as every power granted to Congress sub modo, not only in the spirit of liberty, but in the forms of liberty that are enshrined in the words of the Constitution. There was nothing that fell from me which in any way would have suggested dealing with these people in Utah otherwise than as citizens of the United States.

What is the organic law of a Territory? When by conquest or by treaty the Government of the United States extends its jurisdiction over a soil and people, what is the rule? At first it is necessarily and purely military under treaty stipulation and by the laws of international warfare, the laws of civilized Government, as interpreted by our articles of war and by the practices of war. After that has passed it becomes the duty of Congress to extend the domain and protection of civil law. How is that done? By the organic act, and what is that? An act of Congress making needful rules and regulations for the Government of those people and that soil.

In so doing this, is there a limit to amendment and repeal? There is none. If a law is passed by a Legislature which in terms had its authority to exist, its reason for being, as the French say, in an act of Congress that permitted that Legislature to go into form, that legislative act is within the power of Congress to revise and amend, to do so arbitrarily if you please; and if Congress may repeal the act of the Legislature, it may repeal the act that created the Legislature, it may repeal the whole organic law simply because the Territory is in an inchoate condition; and therefore to liken it to the condition of a State is to state two propositions wholly and entirely and fundamentally different.

I say that the fundamental law of the Territory is dependent upon the revisory power of Congress; it may be amended in any or in all particulars, or it may be wholly repealed. The qualifications of voting are those established by the act of Congress. They may be added to, they may be subtracted from.

The question was asked, can you by the act of a State disfranchise a man not for crime? The answer is, that the State acting in the primary capacity, that the sovereignty of the people can amend its constitution, and the new constitution may add qualifications or it may change them entirely from the old. A State, as most of the States, I believe every State in this Union, chooses to delegate the privilege and franchise of suffrage to certain classes. It excludes males under twenty-one; it generally excludes women by reason of their sex. The exclusions are in almost every other State varied; in many, paupers and insane people are disfranchised, and in a constitution before me of Indiana men enlisted in the Army of the United States or their allies shall not vote. Now, in all of these qualifications, or in the disqualifications to which I have referred, the control of the fact must go with the law that executes the constitution.

But should a State, the people of a State, the majority in whom the sovereign power of the State rests, elect to change their constitution in respect of any qualification for voting, and extend the time to twenty-five years or lower it to sixteen, or admit women or exclude them, or admit paupers or exclude them, these things are entirely at its will. It may be done; and a man who could vote in the year 1880 according to the constitution then being in existence and the laws of the State, may find himself unable, without crime or conviction of any offense, to vote in 1881. That is the power of a State acting through its inherent sovereignty upon the basis of the fundamental and ultimate idea of republican institutions.

But now come to a Territory. Do you mean to apply the same theory or the same principle? What is the organic law of a Territory? A constitution? Not so; it is an act of Congress considered presumably a needful rule for the regulation of that Territory. That is all there is of it. Congress may enlarge to-morrow in any Territory the qualifications for voters, because the authority to vote at all is found in the act of Congress and nowhere else. Therefore there is no similarity whatever in suggesting an irrepealable right of suffrage under laws organizing a Territory and the law under a State which requires the action of the State resorting to a constitutional convention, to the original and primary assemblage of the people, for the purpose of changing its organic form of government.

In this case I do not propose to add anything further to what has been said, and well said, by my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND,] because I had in some degree indicated the same line of opinion. I had stated, and I here reiterate, that there is nothing of the reality of a republican form of government in the Territory of Utah. It is a maleficient and malevolent union of Church and State; it is a theocratic government higher than the Constitution of the United States, in the estimation of its votaries, and which compels an obedience that is hostile to the spirit of liberty and spirit of law and the American laws and constitutions themselves.

Now, the question is, in a republican Congress, under a Constitution expressly guaranteeing to the States a republican form of government, and which is intended in all its departments to be in the form and to breathe the spirit of a republican government, can you say that it is not a needful rule and regulation by Congress to enact such laws as shall bring to an end a doctrine so fatal to republican government and to the constitutional, civil, and religious liberties that that government was designed to protect?

This has been my reason for favoring this bill. I do not doubt for one instant the full power of Congress to pass it. I deny that it takes from a man a right which was not vested in him by law and which he was not capable of losing by a repeal of that law. Is it not in the power of Congress to abolish all elections in the Territories? Can it be doubted? It would be unwise; it would be indiscreet; it would not meet the approval probably of a single man in Congress; but would it not be constitutional? What urged Congress thirty-two years ago to pass the organic act of the country, then called for the first time the Territory of Utah? It was the necessity of civil government over a great region, for the good government of which they were responsible.

Military government had preceded it, and military government, so far as it could, had governed it; but it was the extension of civilization, it was the extension of law, and for that purpose a government was framed of law. Framed by whom? By Congress. Was that the exhaustion of the power of Congress over that? When they passed that organic law, did no power of amendment or repeal exist? To state the question is to answer it. The power continued and remained to make new laws and repeal old laws, to amend such as were faulty and supply such as were wanting until that Territory should by act of Congress be duly admitted as a State of the Union. When that comes the power of Congress is remitted; it is remitted to the State that is an equal State with an autonomical government when it becomes a member of this Union, and then so long as a republican form of government is preserved, that people and that government are answerable to themselves; the power of Congress is then restricted to its relations as a federal power merely. Before that it was more than a federal power; it was the only government of the Territory. After the State shall have become a member of the Union, every citizen finds himself then under a dual sovereignty, his obedience due to the Government of the Union in all things that pertain to the general exterior matters of life, and his allegiance due to the local government in all that affects his ordinary and daily existence.

In this case, however, I consider these definitions and declarations unnecessary. The question is whether it is discreet and wise, or, to use the language of the Constitution, whether it is needful that this law should be passed for the proper government of this Territory. I know not how this great and profound evil can be rooted out. The Senator from Arkansas in his historical researches has read to the Senate how philosophers enlightened by religion proclaim the enmity of polygamy not only to republican government but to virtuous government anywhere, certainly to free government anywhere, and we are attempting to meet these evils by a statute. I will not profess my hopefulness of the result. There are many phases of this question very difficult to discuss and very difficult to measure. How far penal statutes can change human hearts is a question more easily asked than answered. How far a deep-rooted conviction in humanity can hold its own against all the farces that can be arrayed against it is a question that history has given strange answers to; and yet this is a proceeding in the form of law; it is a proceeding warranted by law; it is the execution of a power confided to Congress, and for want of something better I shall vote in favor of it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I am satisfied that the consideration of this bill cannot be completed this evening, and in view of that fact I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senate will finish this bill to-night. ["Oh, no!"] We have a large Calendar. My only motive in appealing to the Senate is the state of the business. Here we are after nearly three months of session, with a Calendar accumulating; and I think if the Senate would only have the patience to sit an hour or two we could dispose of this important question which has been opened and fairly discussed, and then have the coast clear for to-morrow to go on with other business.

Mr. HARRIS. I know that there are Senators on this side who desire to debate the bill, and it is now nearly five o'clock, and I am satisfied that the Senate will have to remain in session till ten or eleven o'clock if the bill is completed to-night. In order that the question may be tested, I will adhere to my motion and let the Senate decide.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I be allowed to say by unanimous consent——

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to debate the bill myself, for the mere pleasure of stating broadly a great quantity of information and views that I have; but I am sure that every Senator understands the principle on which this bill rests, and the general facts that will justify him in voting for it or against it. In the interest of the public business, therefore, I am willing to forego my delight in making long speeches, and to wait and listen to any gentleman who wishes to make them, long or short, and have this bill disposed of. We must stay here to-night or some night if we are to do the enormous mass of business we have in hand.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew the motion, in order that the sense of the Senate may be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 21.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The seats are empty on this side; I call for the yeas and nays, so as to bring them in.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. McPHERSON, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I ask the privilege of withdrawing my vote, as I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Brown,	Grover,	Jones of Florida,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Walker,
Call,	Harris,	Pugh,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Johnston,	Slater,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Vest,

NAYS—29.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Rollins,
Allison,	Farley,	Ingalls,	Sawyer,
Anthony,	Ferry,	McDill,	Sherman,
Bayard,	Garland,	McMillan,	Teller,
Blair,	Gorman,	Miller of Cal.,	Windom.
Conger,	Groome,	Miller of N. Y.,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Morrill,
Dawes,	Hawley,	Platt,

ABSENT—26.

Beck,	Harrison,	Logan,	Ransom,
Camden,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Saunders,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Nevada,	Mitchell,	Vance,
Fair,	Kellogg,	Morgan,	Van Wyck.
Frye,	Lamar,	Pendleton,
George,	Lapham,	Plumb,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Florida has some remarks to submit upon this bill. I want to say to the Senator from Vermont that I have no idea of making a speech upon it, and I expect to vote for it, but I submit to him that when several gentlemen have expressed an anxiety to discuss a very important bill it is not exactly the fair thing to force these gentlemen to proceed with their arguments at this hour of the evening; and hence I shall make the motion which I now make, that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Florida gives way for my motion to adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Florida knows perfectly well how glad I always am to hear him; but I gave notice last Friday and yesterday and to-day that I would ask the Senate to finish this bill because of the importance of other measures that lie behind that must have time, and the Senate has had an opportunity to look this bill over and study it and to hear it discussed. I know it is unpleasant and inconvenient to go on to-night, but I am ready to submit to it, and I think other Senators ought to be, in order to get on with the public business. That is what we care about, and I hope that the Senator from Florida will go on now.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say to my friend from Vermont that I do not want an adjournment with a view of speaking to-morrow, because the few thoughts that I desire to express on this bill I am ready to express now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us go on.

Mr. BUTLER. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 23.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.]

Mr. COKE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] I would vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Brown,	Groome,	Jonas,	Vest,
Call,	Hampton,	Jones of Florida.	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Maxey,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Pugh,	Williams.
Gorman,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,

NAYS—27.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Farley,	McDill,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Garland,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hale,	Miller of N. Y.,	Teller,
Davis of Illinois,	Harrison,	Morrill,	Windom.
Dawes,	Hawley,	Platt,

ABSENT—30.

Allison,	Frye,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Beck,	George,	Lapham,	Saunders,
Butler,	Grover,	Logan,	Sewell,
Camden,	Hill of Georgia,	McPherson,	Slater,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Mahone,	Vance,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck.
Coke,	Jones of Nevada,	Morgan,
Fair,	Kellogg,	Pendleton,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I am unable to concur with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and my colleague [Mr. CALL] in regard to the provisions of this bill. It is very difficult for me to fix any limitation in my mind respecting the power of Congress over the Territories of this Union, and I have nothing to guide my understanding except the precedents of the past. I can only argue in matters of this kind respecting what Congress may do from what it has done with the consent of the entire country and without any objection ever having been made. I do not think that any legislation of a purely arbitrary and despotic character, if it might be so called, was ever passed that compared with that enacted for the government of that territory lying within the bounds of the State that is now represented by myself and my colleague, and that legislation was enacted under a very conservative and thoughtful administration; it was in the era of peace and good-fellowship, when party warfare had subsided, and at a time when there were in Congress some of the most thoughtful guardians of the Constitution that ever stood on this floor. In 1821, under Mr. Monroe's administration, we find Congress legislating for the Territory of Florida and enacting a law compared with which that now reported by the Senator from Vermont is mild indeed. Let me read from the second section of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1821, for the government of the Territory of Florida. Congress in the exercise of its wisdom thought proper to enact:

> That, until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of said Territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same Territories, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct for the maintaining the inhabitants of said Territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the laws of the United States relating to the revenue and its collection, subject to the modification stipulated by the fifteenth article of the said treaty, in favor of Spanish vessels and their cargoes, and the laws relating to the importation of persons of color, shall be extended to the said Territories.

Here was a Territory that had just been transferred from the jurisdiction of a foreign power, containing a large number of foreign people, it is true, mixed inhabitants, and it became necessary for the Government of the United States in the exercise of the very power they are called upon to exercise now, to provide for the wholesome government of the Territory of Florida. They had municipal government there under the Spanish rule. There were town and city organizations. All constitutional forms of government, let me say to the Senate, were not entirely disregarded by the Spanish authorities. They had no local legislature, but they had representative governments in their cities and towns, the military, however, being the chief authority. In 1821 Congress transferred the whole power of government in that Territory, legislative, executive, judicial, civil, and military, into the hands of any one man that the President might designate, as he thought the circumstances might warrant, gave him almost absolute power over everything within the Territory, leaving it to the discretion of his appointees to do anything and everything which might be necessary for the well-being of the Territory.

If the Constitution of the United States was in full operation within that Territory, how was it possible for that law to stand? If it were competent in the estimation of the thoughtful men who sat in Congress at that day to blend together the judicial and legislative powers in one hand, and give almost unlimited authority over the lives and property of the people there to a Presidential appointee, is it not competent for Congress to enact this bill? I never heard of that law being questioned? It is true it was not intended as a permanent measure, but that argues nothing on the question of the power to enact it. It was a temporary measure enacted to meet a special emergency just like this bill is; but nobody questioned the power of Congress to enact it.

After that came a subsequent law a little better guarded so far as the constitutional rights of the inhabitants were concerned. It gave I think the whole legislative power of the Territory to thirteen councilmen, composing the legislative council of the Territory of Florida. That council was invested with full legislative authority over that Territory, and the people had no voice whatever in the selection of those men. They passed laws which were administered in the local courts. The inhabitants had none of those rights of local government which had existed under the Spanish authority; all these were absolutely taken away.

I do not think that the rights affected by the provisions of this bill are purely personal or private rights that fall within that provision of the Constitution which declares that a man's property or privileges shall not be taken away, except in a given manner. The provision in this bill goes on to declare that persons in a certain status, not because they have committed certain offenses in the past, not because they have been guilty of polygamy, but persons in a certain status in society, persons having more than one wife at the time of the enactment of this statute, shall not be qualified to exercise the high public privilege of making laws for the government of that Territory; that their voice shall not be heard in the enactment of the laws necessary to conserve and to protect the great body of society in Utah. That is the question.

If it was competent for the Congress of the United States to vest the entire powers of government in the hands of one man in Florida, as it did, and to give him authority to make the laws and regulations necessary for the protection of society there, in a territorial condition, who can question the right of Congress under the same power to-day to say that a class of people in the condition of the Mormons shall not exercise the privilege of government? There is no right of property taken away here, none whatever; and all those analogies which have been drawn from invasions of the rights of private property are not applicable to a great public question like this, in which the rights of society are involved as separate from those of individuals. If this were an attempt to take away from the Mormon people the property which they had acquired by their industry, by the decision of five men proposed to be constituted, it would present a serious question; but I know no principle of law that teaches that the Constitution of the United States operates in a Territory the same as it does in a State.

In the case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, decided in 1 Peters, Chief-Justice Marshall at that early day held that a territorial court sitting in the Territory of Florida was not known to the Constitution of the United States; that its deliberations and judgments would not be taken notice of here; that it was a creature of local legislation with which the Federal judiciary here had nothing to do. It merely shows that a Territory in that position was outside of the fundamental law and was in a position to be legislated for at the will and discretion of Congress without any limitation. Of course all cases of that kind would present a question as to the policy of the measure, the inherent justice of it, and things of that kind, but with regard to our power I for one entertain no doubt whatever.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend from South Carolina withdraw that a moment and let me make a suggestion?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know that several Senators have special engagements this evening, and I am extremely anxious to have this bill finished not only for the sake of the two hundred cases on the Calendar undisposed of but for some other reasons. Now, I wish to make the suggestion, that we have an understanding that we will vote to-morrow on or before four o'clock as the case may be; or I will say five if Senators prefer that.

Mr. TELLER. You had better say five.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will say now on or before four.

Several SENATORS. Five.

Mr. BROWN. Say six.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is too long. I would only ask for myself, in charge of the bill, to have ten minutes at the end if Senators are willing to hear me, to state anything in behalf of the committee that we may think desirable. Of course I should be glad myself to debate this matter at large, but in the state of the public business I do not feel justified in doing it. I therefore suggest, for the convenience of Senators, that there be an understanding that we vote, I will say at five o'clock or four, if the debate is finished.

Mr. BUTLER. Five, I suggest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that the Senator in charge of the bill—if I happen to be ill, somebody in my place—may have ten minutes at the end to close the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont suggests that there be an understanding that the Senate vote on this bill at five o'clock to-morrow, or not later than five o'clock to-morrow. Is there any objection?

Mr. BROWN. I object to that, because I do not think we can fully discuss a measure so important by five o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, then, I hope the Senate will not go into executive session.

Mr. BUTLER. I renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask to be recognized as entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alabama. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MAXEY, (at five o'clock and eighteen minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Acting Secretary proceeded to call the roll on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

Mr. GROVER. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I notice that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] is not in his seat. I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Brown,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Walker,
Butler,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Williams.
Call,	Harris,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Jonas,	Vest,

NAYS—20.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Hill of Colorado,	Platt,
Bayard,	Edmunds,	McDill,	Plumb,
Blair,	Farley,	McMillan,	Rollins,
Conger,	Garland,	Miller of Cal.,	Sawyer,
Davis of Illinois,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Teller.

ABSENT—39.

Allison,	George,	Kellogg,	Ransom,
Anthony,	Groome,	Lamar,	Saunders,
Beck,	Grover,	Lapham,	Sewell,
Camden,	Hale,	Logan,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	McPherson,	Slater,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Georgia,	Mahone,	Vance,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	Miller of N. Y.,	Van Wyck,

Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Pendleton,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn.

Several SENATORS. There is no quorum voting.

Mr. BAYARD. I would like the attention of my friend from Vermont——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] was recognized.

Mr. HARRIS. Nobody has the floor on the bill now until there is a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the attention of my friend from Vermont. The only motion I think now warranted by the rules is to adjourn or send for absentees. I am disposed to believe that there is not the slightest disposition to delay a vote upon this bill, but I think there is a sense of uncertainty in the minds of gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, among whom I think I may rank my friend from Georgia, as to what would be the period occupied by legitimate debate upon the bill, a debate which I am sure is welcomed by the Senator from Vermont, but which he desires at the same time to bring within the ordinary rules of what I may call the business of the body.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator from Delaware if he considers the pressure brought by the committee to bring the bill to a vote as within the ordinary practice of the Senate?

Mr. BAYARD. I am not speaking of that. My own view is that the more important the bill, the more important a Senator considers it, the more the duty of the body to discuss it and debate it. I believe as a matter of practical fact that we can come to a vote and end this bill to-morrow and in to-morrow's session, and I do not think that the approach to that fact is in the least degree hastened by continuing the session of the Senate now. The hour of half past five having been reached, which during the entire session is the latest hour that we have sat, I submit to the consideration of my friend from Vermont, with whom I shall vote upon the subject, that we shall reach a vote upon the bill as soon by an adjournment now as we shall in any other way that can be devised.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent, there being no quorum, to make an observation. I wish to say to the Senator from Alabama that the Committee on the Judiciary has no disposition to press anybody at any time.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, I understand that there was an agreement in the committee before they brought the bill in here that it should be pressed to a vote without an adjournment. I ask the Senator from Vermont if that is the fact?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Although I do not belong to the body of people who acknowledge the duty or the responsibility of catechism, (we acknowledge the right of catechism,) in this instance I reply with pleasure that there was no such understanding or vote or allusion to any such thing. I was instructed to report the bill and to give notice that I would call the attention of the Senate to it at an early day, and I called special attention to it in order that Senators might examine it and make up their minds upon it and be ready to debate it and to vote upon it.

Mr. MORGAN. But the Senator gave notice at the same time that he would press the bill to a vote to-day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At the same time he did not.

Mr. MORGAN. Yesterday he did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said to the Senate that at an early day I should be glad to have a vote upon the bill. On Friday last I gave notice that yesterday I should ask to take up the bill, and on behalf of the committee, not because they had instructed me to do that precise thing, but I felt it within the scope of the discretion of the chairman, that I should ask the Senate to dispose of it yesterday or to-day, as might be convenient to the Senate. That is all there was about pressure.

Now, with two hundred cases on the Calendar of the Senate reported from the committees undisposed of, to-day or to-morrow, or some day, the Senate if it does its public duty has got to begin to work, and it cannot get on with public business by going through until half past one with all sorts of motions and suggestions about what we will do, and taking up what are called unobjected cases, which in a number of instances turn out to be doubtful and disputable cases, but notwithstanding we feel so kindly that we dislike to object, and then take up the business of the day before, and spend an hour or two on that, and then have an executive session. We must work more time; that is all. The Judiciary Committee has no malevolence toward anybody, nor a desire to unduly press anything. We only wish to contribute according to the judgment of the Senate what we may to the convenient dispatch of its business. That is all.

My friend from Georgia objected to the understanding for five o'clock to-morrow. I am myself usually not in favor of such understandings, because something might happen to lead a Senator to feel justified in desiring to state what he wishes to state upon the subject and the time might run out; but for this occasion I will suggest that by a unanimous understanding, (which of course does not go on the Journal, and which is therefore just as binding as if a quorum were here, and no more,) we shall take up the bill after the regular ordinary business of the morning hour is through to-morrow, so as to save about an hour in the morning, with the understanding that we shall vote at five o'clock or before if possible. Does my friend from Georgia object to that? That gives him the additional hour.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to vote for the bill. I find, however, by an examination of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in comparison with the bill that I am not able to vote for some sections of it upon constitutional grounds. I desire merely to read those authorities to the Senate in opposition to certain sections, in the hope that the committee may be able in their wisdom to devise some modification of the two sections to which I refer which would make the measure, in my opinion, constitutional, and relieve it from the objections I have to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure the Senator will understand that it will give the committee the greatest pleasure, and I hope he has not understood anything otherwise, to hear his suggestions.

Mr. MORGAN. I have only stated that there was an extraordinary pressure for the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all.

Mr. MORGAN. It has been taken out of the regular order and pressed upon the attention of the Senate against the ordinary practice, under which we were likely to adjourn before five o'clock, and with only two hundred cases on the Calendar, when frequently we have discussed bills here day after day when there were numberless bills on the Calendar. I do not wish to obstruct the Senator's control of the bill. I am willing to stay here to-night in order to pass the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator from Alabama have any objection to taking up the bill to-morrow morning, immediately after the regular morning business, with an understanding that we shall dispose of it by five o'clock?

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to that myself, but I do not want to bind Senators who are absent by an agreement of that kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a different thing. We can bind those who are here, so far as that goes.

Mr. BROWN. I beg to assure the honorable chairman of the committee that I have no captious disposition to delay action on the bill, nor do I desire to postpone the vote one hour after it can be fairly discussed. I consider it one of the most important measures that have ever been before the American Senate, involving exceedingly delicate questions, constitutional and otherwise; and I do not think it ought to be pressed through the Senate without the usual full and free discussion that ought always to be had on such an occasion. I believe we shall reach a vote by four o'clock to-morrow; but I know it very often happens when we are going on with some particular measure here that something else is sprung and the attention of the Senate is diverted. Half the time to-morrow may be taken up in motions or something that does not pertain to this matter, when we might be discussing it. If we take it up as early as we can after the general routine of the morning business is attended to, and go on with it, and vote down all propositions to take up anything else, I think we shall reach a decision by four o'clock. I would be willing to say that by half after five I shall consent to vote upon the question, with the hope that we may reach a vote sooner.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I will make it half after five.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont suggests that it be understood that the bill be taken up to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine business of the morning hour has been gone through with, and that the Senate vote upon it on or before half past five o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the right of the chairman in charge of the bill to have ten minutes, as I have stated before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With the right of the chairman in charge of the bill to have ten minutes to close the discussion. Is there objection to that understanding? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I renew my motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1882.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. F. D. POWER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of January 30, 1882, a list of persons who have died by reason of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted in the line of duty in the Life-Saving Service since the origin of that service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BUFFALO BAYOU, TEXAS.

Mr. MILLS, by unanimous consent, presented a statement of the Houston Cotton Exchange and the Board of Trade of Houston, Texas, showing the importance of improving Buffalo Bayou, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SUPERVISION OF RAILROADS.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, railroad and other monopolies, their powers and duties, are questions attracting public attention to an unwonted degree, and pressing for consideration in Congress and State Legislatures.

The public mind is fast becoming imbued with the idea that tariff, transportation, telegraph, trade, and patent monopolies, as now conducted, are far from being unmitigated blessings; that they carry with them a power and influence which, being misdirected, are potent for evil, and, if left to operate uncontrolled, society in the New as in the Old World will soon be divided into two classes, with wealth and aristocracy on the one side and peasantry and poverty on the other.

Thinking men of every class will agree that such a state of society is not the best attainable; and while equality in wealth, as in mind and morals, is not to be expected, yet by prudent action on the part of those having power to interpose, and the exercise of ordinary discretion and forbearance on the part of the more fortunate, this inequality may be so mitigated and softened as not to oppress or chafe the less fortunate.

History is constantly repeating itself, and one of the lessons impressed upon every civilized age and nation of mankind is that when wealth and power concentrate in the hands of the few and are used improvidently or prostituted to purposes of unlimited self-aggrandizement, dissatisfaction, distress, and revolution are apt to follow on the part of the many, culminating in acts of violence and destruction of property.

The great Daniel Webster in one of his speeches used the following language:

> The freest government cannot long endure where the tendency of the law is to create a rapid accumulation of property in the hands of a few and to render the masses of the people poor and dependent.

It too often happens that when men grow rich they grow selfish, and being removed from the walks of poverty know but little of the needs and sufferings of the poor. Upon such men the teachings of history are lost, and their eyes become blinded by the wealth and luxury of their surroundings.

At this point of antagonism between the two classes it becomes the duty of government, to the extent of the powers vested, to protect the weak against the strong, and harmonize conflicting interests as far as possible, that society may suffer no shock and the integrity of our institutions may be maintained.

WHY GOVERNMENTS ARE INSTITUTED.

To assert the proposition that governments are instituted among men for the benefit of the governed is to assert a truism that may seem trite and commonplace. But in speaking, writing, or legislating upon subjects of great general interest, we cannot too often recur to first principles and make them the starting point, the corner-stone of every theory or argument we attempt to build, affecting the relation of members of society to each other.

It is much to be regretted, however, that in very many cases while men are quite ready to give the assent of their minds to great and indisputable truths, such as lie at the foundation of all well-adjusted human institutions, yet when called to make a practical application of them they find it convenient, from motives of policy or interest, to relegate them to the background or ignore them entirely.

This is not true statesmanship, nor does such a course harmonize with the principles of justice and true manhood. Wherever truth and justice lead the way, no honest man should fear to follow, disregarding the sophistries of politics, the maxims of worldly wisdom, and the seductive influences of wealth or position. The man who cannot rise to this level is unfit to be a people's representative, and unworthy the confidence of his fellow-men.

If, then, it be true that governments are instituted for the benefit of the governed, it follows that every subject of such government is entitled to like care, encouragement, and protection. It matters not that men, be they few or many, associate themselves in a corporate capacity, with special privileges secured by charter, and possessed of their millions of gold, they are equally amenable to government and law, and must be held to the same rule of fair dealing that governs the humblest citizen.

I know that a great writer has said:

Plate sin with gold,
And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks.
Arm it in rags, a pigmy's straw doth pierce it.

There is, alas! much of truth in this declaration, yet charity for our race should incline us to the belief that its chief coloring is the result of poetic license.

A COMMON-LAW VIEW OF THE SUBJECT.

Bringing this question of railroad duties and responsibilities to the test of common-law and common-sense principles, aside from any constitutional view of it, the following points may be safely insisted upon:

First. No railroad can be built in any State or Territory without the consent of such State in the former or the consent of Congress in the latter case. Being purely artificial bodies they exist only by and through an act of legislation, and have no natural inherent rights, such as appertain to individual citizens, and therefore can exercise no powers, except such as are specifically granted or clearly deducible therefrom.

Secondly. Whether created by a State Legislature or by an act of Congress, the eminent domain necessary for the construction of the roadway must be granted by the terms of its charter, and when granted is taken subject to the limitation that the road must be operated for the benefit of the public to a fair and reasonable extent, and not alone in the interest of the company.

Thirdly. The government, State or Federal, as the case may be, or perhaps it may be more proper to say the people, form a quasi partnership with the company, each taking stock in the enterprise; the people through their government subscribing the right of way through their domain, frequently making grants of public land and money subsidies, while the company furnishes the remainder of the capital necessary to construct the roadway, purchase the rolling-stock and other equipments, all to be used for the benefit of both.

That this principle is correct will not be doubted at this late day, since more than two hundred years ago the most eminent lawyer of his time, Chief-Justice Hale, of England, laid down this sound principle of common law. He says:

When private property is affected with a public interest it ceases to be juris privati only.

This decision has been acquiesced in from that day to the present, and has been recently reaffirmed by Judge Waite, our able Chief-Justice of the United States, in the case of Munn against Illinois, (4th Otto, page 113,) in the following language:

When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest he in effect grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public, for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created.

Fourthly. There being then two parties interested in said road, the power to determine their respective rights, in case of conflict, must be lodged somewhere, as law commentators are agreed that there is no such thing as a legal right without a remedy.

This power could not be intrusted to an incorporated company with any degree of safety to the public interest, because the history of all such corporations, as well as daily observations and experience prove irrefutably that each member of said corporation, feeling only a divided responsibility and animated by a zeal for the interests of the company, loses sight of any claim belonging to the public. It follows as a consequence that this power must be lodged in the Government, which is the representative of all the people, whether individuals or corporations.

Fifthly. To make this power effective, legislation either by State Legislatures or Congress, or both, within their respective spheres, may and often does become necessary, leaving to State governors or the President of the United States the power to veto hasty or improvident legislation, with the reserved right to either party of appealing to the courts of the country.

I apprehend these assumptions are correct and will not be called in question. Upon any other hypothesis railroad companies would be left to follow their own interests in their own way, to the injury of individual rights and the obstruction, and if they so willed, the destruction of interstate commerce.

Surely it will not be seriously contended that the framers of the Constitution took from the States the power to regulate interstate commerce only to lay it at the feet of irresponsible corporations. Was it supposed that the States through their Legislatures were less likely to foster and encourage such commerce than railroad companies? To indulge such a supposition is to underrate the intelligence of the makers of the Constitution.

Thus it will be seen that under the principles of the common law all corporations which have dedicated their property to the use of the public are required in its management to consult the public interest as well as their own.

But, as I will presently show from the Constitution itself, there is no doubt of the power in Congress to control railroads, so far as interstate commerce is concerned. The chief difficulties incident to the whole subject have grown out of loose Legislation in framing charters for them, as I propose now to demonstrate.

RAILROAD CHARTERS NOT SUFFICIENTLY GUARDED.

Some apology for the loose legislation in framing railroad charters during their earlier history may be found in the fact that they are comparatively modern institutions, and when first put in operation showed such wonderful results as to bewilder legislators, cause them to lose sight of ordinary prudence, and grant charters not sufficiently defining the powers and duties of the roads on the one hand, and not properly protecting the rights and interests of the public on the other.

For centuries past canal and turnpike companies had been organized under acts of incorporation. The right of eminent domain had been granted them, and their powers and duties were well and clearly defined in their charters. When built the channel of the canal, tow-path, locks, and dams were the property of the companies, but private individuals had the right to use their own boats in these water-ways, paying such tax or toll for the use of the same as their charters prescribed.

Turnpikes were chartered and built in the same way, the companies owning the road-beds, toll-gates, and other appurtenances, while the general public had the right to travel over them in their own vehicles, paying toll for the use of the same.

But when railroads came to be chartered, the companies proposing to build them not only secured the eminent domain for their road-beds, but secured vast amounts of public land and, in many cases, money subsidies, all of which were claimed by the companies as their property, without limitation or restriction, to be used and managed as they thought proper. They did not become public highways in the same sense as canals and turnpikes. No private individual could run his engine and cars over any track of a railroad, paying toll for the use of the same, but all were compelled to travel and transport freight in the cars of the companies, subject to their will as to compensation for services rendered, and the time and manner of rendering such services.

The difference in these public highways is apparent to every one. Canals and turnpikes are highways in a broader sense than railroads. The former may be used by any one who can manage his own boat or drive his own team, while the latter may in some sense be considered as close corporations, using their own engines and cars to the exclusion of all others, fixing their own prices for travel or transportation, granting special rates to favorites, extorting upon shippers of way freight where there is no competition, breaking freight shipped in bulk to enhance their earnings, indulging in railroad wars and changing rates without notice to the public, to the advantage of one shipper and the detriment of another, and generally embarrassing interstate commerce, regardless of the public interests and convenience.

Railroad magnates and their coadjutors, consisting of subsidized attorneys, lobbyists, legislators, courts, and a large part of the press, claim that by the terms of their charters these extraordinary rights and privileges are guaranteed to them, and neither State Legislatures nor Congress can alter, abridge, restrict, or in any way interfere with the exercise of them.

This brings me to the consideration of two very important points in connection with the subject. First, has Congress a supervisory and restraining power over said roads, so far as interstate commerce is concerned? Secondly, if it has this power, to what extent should it be embodied in legislation.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS.

To determine this question it is only necessary to quote the language of the Constitution of the United States and refer to some decisions interpreting said language.

Article 1, section 8, clause 3 of the Constitution reads as follows:

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Section 8, clause 18, confers upon Congress the further power—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, &c.

Nothing can be clearer than that the power to regulate interstate commerce belongs exclusively to Congress, and the power to legislate for its protection and encouragement is equally clear.

It will be readily conceded and no argument is necessary to establish the fact, that where the termini of any railroad lie within any one State, and the road is used only for local purposes, freights transported thereon not passing into another State, the Legislature of the State in which such road lies has exclusive jurisdiction of all matters connected with it. But when the termini are in different States, or where the road is used as part of a line over which freights pass from one State to another, then the jurisdiction of Congress attaches.

The framers of the Constitution well knew that States, as individuals, have their jealousies and predilections, and that these feelings would show themselves in acts of legislation, provoking retaliation which would greatly embarrass the commerce carried on between them. This embarrassment was felt under the articles of confederation, and, among other causes, led to the adoption of the present Constitution. That learned commentator upon the Constitution, Chief-Justice Story, uses the following language:

The want of this power (to regulate commerce) was one of the leading defects of the confederation, and probably, as much as any one cause, conduced to the establishment of the Constitution. * * * It is a power vital to the prosperity of the Union; and without it the Government would scarcely deserve the name of a national Government, and would soon sink into discredit and imbecility. It would stand as a mere shadow of sovereignty to mock our hopes and involve us in a common ruin. * * * Indeed, without this power to regulate commerce among the States, the power of regulating foreign commerce would be incomplete and ineffectual. * * * The want of uniformity in the regulations of commerce was a source of perpetual strife and dissatisfaction, of inequalities and rivalries, and retaliations among the States.

If at the time Judge Story penned this language this power in Congress was felt to be necessary and proper for the protection of interstate commerce, how much more pressing the need to-day.

Commerce is now being conducted largely by means of railroads, which have superseded the old-time common carriers. Competition is well-nigh destroyed, and a grand monopoly has risen upon its ruins. The turnpike is no longer available except for local purposes. The canal-boat travels too slowly for this fast age, our rivers are inaccessible to a large portion of our population, and railroads have become a necessity to the commerce of our rapidly expanding country.

The hope was long cherished by those who suffered at the hands of these roads from undue discriminations and other improper acts, that competition among themselves would bring the corrective, but the history of these institutions has demonstrated the folly of such hope. The process of pooling their freights, of agreeing upon a minimum tariff of rates, and other practices common to these corporations have shown that they work together to build themselves up at the expense of the public.

It must be clear to every mind, therefore, that railroad competition among themselves will afford no adequate protection to the public against extortion and mismanagement. Other means must be resorted to having a restraining influence upon them.

Congress ought and must interpose in behalf of the people. Its power is ample, as shown by reference to the following decisions: Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 1, 227, 229; Brown vs. Maryland, 12 id., 419–446; The City of New York vs. Miln, 11 Peters, 102–157; Grover vs. Slaughter, 15 id., 449–511; Welton vs. State of Missouri, 1 Otto, 275–280; The Daniel Ball, 10 Wallace, 557; The State Freight Tax, 15 id., 232–275; The Railroad Company vs. Richmond, 19 id., 584; The Granger Cases, 4 Otto, 113 et seq., pages 155, 164, 180; Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company vs. Husen, Chicago Legal News, February 2, 1878. Upon an examination of these cases it will be found that every feature of the subject has been scanned and judgment pronounced upon each.

HOW FAR SHOULD CONGRESS LEGISLATE UPON THE SUBJECT?

Unquestionably to the extent of properly regulating and protecting interstate commerce, of guarding individual citizens against unjust discriminations and exactions in the matter of freight transportation, and the general public against immoral practices.

The absence of Congressional legislation defining the powers and duties of railroads as common carriers in connection with interstate commerce, seems to have induced the opinion on their part that if Congress ever possessed that power it had lost it by non-user, or had determined to waive it indefinitely, and that they had a right to become "a law unto themselves" upon this subject, and as their accumulations increased and the public became more patient and submissive they could venture to become more aggressive.

STATE LEGISLATION UPON THE SUBJECT.

Their course at last called forth legislation from fourteen of the States of the Union, more or less stringent in character. The State of New York, by its railroad legislation, is now saving to the people annually more than a million of dollars. Georgia, in the same way, has lessened the burdens of her people more than one hundred thousand dollars a year, and so of other States, without injury to any of their roads.

But these statutes are only local in their application and do not reach the evils of the system. There are but few roads which begin and end in the same State, or do not constitute parts of a line upon which freights are carried into another State. In such localized roads the public outside the State have little interest.

Commerce is the sale or exchange of commodities between individuals or communities of individuals, and is confined to no particular class or character of merchandise.

The hatter or the shoemaker, as he plies his trade and turns out daily hundreds of his class of goods, does not expect to wear these goods himself, but to sell or barter them for others that he needs but does not produce.

The farmer, as he sows his wheat-field and reaps and thrashes out his grain, is constantly watching the market to learn where he can sell or exchange it to the best advantage. The pork-packer, the cattle-grazer, the cotton-planter, work in hope that in some quarter they may realize remunerative prices for their products; and as it is one of the laws of production that the best market is seldom found at the door of the producer or manufacturer, the necessity arises for transporting the surplus to a point at a greater or less distance for profitable sale or exchange. This state of things brought into existence a class of people called "common carriers," who for a consideration transport articles from point to point. Railroads being of this class, and by reason of the advantages they possess in safe and rapid transit, have made themselves a necessity to the commercial world, and oftentimes mercilessly exact tribute from their customers.

THE CHOICE OF USING RAILROADS NO CHOICE AT ALL.

It is no answer to the argument against extortionate rates to say that those engaged in commerce or the producer or manufacturer may or may not use the railroads as means of transportation. In many cases there is no alternative, and where it does exist, if adopted, would place the party adopting it at a great disadvantage.

Markets at the great points of trade are constantly fluctuating, and ready access to them is necessary to the trader or producer, that he may take the market at its ebb. He must avail himself of quick transportation, or he is lost in the superior watchfulness and activity of others. It is a well-settled law of trade that imports wait upon exports, and that goods imported will seek that port of entry where an outward cargo can be most readily obtained. At these points, too, the best markets are generally found, or, if transportation to a foreign market is desired, can be more readily and cheaply secured.

To show that there can, then, be no reasonable choice as to means of transportation, let me illustrate: The prices of breadstuffs or cotton from some cause take a sudden spring in Europe, and consequently stimulate prices in Boston, New York, or New Orleans. Some shipper concludes to use the turnpike or canal for transportation because he objects to railroad charges. In the mean time those using the railroads rush their products into market, supply the demand, and prices drop back to old figures before the turnpike or canal customer reaches the point with his goods. But one experiment of the kind would be needed to prove to his satisfaction that the only alternative was railroad or ruin, and that he must succumb to their demands, however unreasonable and unjust.

MEN ARE AFRAID OF RAILROADS.

These companies know how reluctant individuals are to enter into controversy with them, and they take advantage of this knowledge. To show the dread which even stout-hearted men have on this subject, I beg leave to quote from a most elaborate and exhaustive report made by a committee appointed by the New York Legislature in 1879, charged with the duty of inquiring into all matters relating to railroads in that State. See page 50 of said report for the following language:

Not a shipper would testify voluntarily, however freely he might talk in private, but insisted upon being subpœnaed and put in the light of being dragged before the committee and compelled to answer.

* * * * * * *

Here is plainly expressed on the part of a powerful body of merchants an unwillingness to disclose abuses they know to exist, because there is no power permanently to stand between them and the railroads with whom they must deal, and who would doubtless make them pay for their disclosure by increasing their rates or by canceling special contracts. This power on the one hand and this fear on the other will always exist so long as the scale of freight charges is permitted to be a system of rewards and punishments.

* * * * * * *

Conciliate their good-will, court their favor, and favorable rates will follow; incur their hostility, and the margin of their displeasure may be read on your freight bills.

Are not such confessions deeply humiliating, and do they not show a subserviency to railroad power which is truly alarming? Shall said roads because of their necessity and, I may add, great usefulness, overawe and beat down individual citizens of the Republic, adjusting their tariff of freights not to meet what would be a fair and just compensation for the use and risk of capital invested and expenses incurred in operating their roads, but adjusting their rates at what customers can be forced to pay or "what the product will bear?"

To acquiesce in the exercise of such power would not only allow them to shackle commerce, but to handicap the producer and manufacturer.

To show the arbitrary manner in which they exercise power, I quote again from said report, page 54:

In July last, during a war of rates, wheat was carried from Chicago to New York for ten cents per hundred. In August it was put up to fifteen cents, a "living rate." A short European harvest created an unusual demand, a bountiful harvest here created an extraordinary supply. The carrying capacity of all roads leading to the seaboard was taxed to the utmost. The rates were gradually raised from fifteen cents, in August, to forty cents in November. It cost the roads just as much to haul a hundred pounds of grain in August as in November. The rate was raised simply because the condition of the market warranted it and the product could bear it. It would be difficult to make a criticism upon that raise which public judgment would sustain. But we are distinctly told that public interest plays an insignificant rôle in the theater of railroad management. It is at best but a servant waiting upon the interest of the stockholders. The wrong consists in exercising a censorship over the business affairs of the community, secretly, arbitrarily, and unequally varying rates, building up this, developing that, not only performing the proper functions of transportation, but taking into consideration the probable or possible profit of a shipment, and adjusting their rates accordingly. If the shipper is likely to make a large profit, they compel him to divide; if the margin is a close one, they determine whether the shipment shall be made or not, whether it shall result in a profit or loss, and the amount of profit or loss.

Is it one of the functions of a railroad to adjust the profits of the producer or manufacturer, allowing him to realize a certain per cent. and appropriate the balance to its own use?

If thus allowed to interfere with all the industries of life, how long would it take them to draw to themselves the wealth of the nation, undermine social order and government itself?

ARBITRARY DISCRIMINATION IN FREIGHT CHARGES.

The exercise of this power, though covert and insidious in character, is, nevertheless, a direct assault upon commerce. Its effect is felt by the cultivator of the soil, the manufacturer, the lumber dealer, the miner, and all others who send their products to market, or buy and ship the necessaries of life to their homes.

The smile of a railroad company promises favor if not fortune; its frown threatens disaster if not bankruptcy. Unconditional submission to its demands, with sworn secrecy as to its proceedings, can alone smooth its corrugated brow and secure the privilege of special rates. Wealth and aristocracy have free access to its sanctum, while poverty and obscurity stand in the outer court neglected and despised.

To show that I speak by the record, I again quote from the report of the New York committee. Before doing so, however, let me state that in 1872 an agreement was entered into between the Central, Erie, Lake Shore, and Pennsylvania roads upon the one part, and the South Improvement (Oil) Company including the Standard Oil Company of Ohio as a branch, with a nominal capital of half a million of dollars on the other part. This agreement contained a number of stipulations, and among others the following: (See page 41 of said report.)

ARTICLE 4. And it is hereby further covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto, that the party hereto of the second part (railroad companies) shall at all times co-operate, as far as it legally may, with the party hereto of the first part (oil companies) to maintain business of the party hereto of the first part against loss or injury by competition, to the end that the party hereto of the first part may keep up a remunerative, and so a full and regular business, and to that end shall lower or raise the gross rates of transportation over its railroads and connections, as far as it legally may, for such times and to such extent as may be necessary to overcome such competition. The rebates and drawbacks to the party of the first part to be varied pari passu with the gross rates.

This agreement, which was intended to be private, became known to the Pennsylvania Legislature, and at once the charter of the South Improvement (Oil) Company was repealed, the business however being continued under the name and charter of the Standard Oil Company of Ohio.

Here, then, is a conspiracy of rich and powerful railroads on the one hand, and scarcely less rich and powerful oil companies on the other, all purely artificial beings, deriving their privileges, franchises, and very existence from the laws of their incorporation; resting under moral and legal obligations to give equal and exact justice alike to all customers, seeking to build up one set of men at the expense of another engaged in a like business. And to secure that end these railroads obligate themselves to indemnify the oil companies "against loss or injury by competition."

But to pursue this subject a little further, read on page 48 of said report:

The committee find, made and in force within the period of one year, a number of special contracts on the Central and Hudson River road, estimated by the railroad people at six thousand. The number on the Erie was very much less, though the practice of giving them the same.

* * * * * * *

In all instances they varied the open rate to the advantage of the party obtaining the special rate. These rates are made secret; secrecy being expressly or impliedly part of the agreement.

* * * * * * *

Every man who pays the tariff rate is discriminated against when any man is given a special rate on a similar shipment.

Comment upon these facts is unnecessary. They stand out in such grossly revolting colors as to strike every honest man with astonishment and indignation; in their greed of gain abusing public favor bestowed upon them in the way of liberal charters, striking down one set of business men to advance another, and all under a bond of secrecy, must carry to the mind of every thinking man the conviction that something must be done to checkmate these gigantic institutions before they have compassed their end of subordinating every other interest to their own. Who will not say they should be made to realize that there is a power greater than any they possess, which will be exerted to put an end to such abuses? What honorable man is so wedded to railroad interests and so oblivious to the claims of a great public as to sanction such injustice, not to say gross immorality?

DISREGARD OF PROPER RATIO BETWEEN DIFFERENT POINTS OF SHIPMENT.

Nothing has tended to create greater dissatisfaction or stronger prejudices in the public mind against railroads than their failure to prorate freights according to distance. Their policy, without exception, seems to have been to operate their roads for all they could be made to bring to the stockholders. Officers and employés under their managers have been taught to keep, under all circumstances, an eye to the interest of the stockholders, and take advantage of every circumstance promotive of this end. In the examination of witnesses by said New York committee a Mr. Butler, being called, testified:

That he serves the stockholders only, and only regards the public interest to make it tributary to the interest of the stockholders.

A Mr. Blanchard, another witness, said:

I knew of no claim that the non-shareholding interests had upon me as a railroad officer, so long as I was within the written law, to concede its views in the matter of rates and in the management of our traffic.

In a joint letter published some time since by Messrs. Vanderbilt and Jewett, two of what are termed railroad kings, they say:

The managers of a railway company desire to make all the money they can for their clients, and to do this they have constantly before them the question what rate within their chartered limits will an article bear that will yield the largest profit.

I again read from said report:

William W. Mack, of Rochester, edge-tool manufacturer, testifies that he shipped his goods to New York, and had them reshipped to Cincinnati, via Rochester, and saved fourteen cents per hundred-weight thereby; shipped goods to New York, and then reshipped to Saint Louis, via Rochester, and saved eighteen cents per hundred-weight. In each case the railroad hauled the goods about seven hundred miles farther than a direct haul from Rochester, and did it fourteen and eighteen cents cheaper, respectively.

* * * * * * *

Port Jervis millers have grain shipped from the West via Port Jervis to Newburgh, and thence hauled back to Port Jervis, a distance of fifty miles, at a less rate than they could stop the cars at Port Jervis in the first instance.

* * * * * * *

The county of Franklin is recognized as non-competing territory, and as such, well illustrates the higher rates which neutral ground is required to pay. For instance, they charge sixty cents a hundred on butter shipped to Boston from all points in Saint Lawrence County over the Ogdensburgh and Lake Champlain, and Vermont Central roads, seventy cents from the nearer county of Franklin, and the rate increasing as you approach Boston, until it is ninety cents from Saint Albans, Vermont.

It is needless to multiply facts and figures upon this point. There is not a man in this House or out of it who does not know that where there is no choice of means of transportation railroads seldom fail to charge higher rates for the fraction of a hundred miles than for many times that distance where there is competition and choice of means. I might cite numberless instances coming within my own knowledge and experience in relation to railroads in my own section. Upon the New Orleans, Saint Louis and Chicago and the Mobile and Ohio Railroads these discriminations are constantly and openly made; even transporting freight from Saint Louis and Memphis to New Orleans and Mobile for half the amount charged from intermediate points, and less than half the distance. In the one case they are subjected to the competition of the Mississippi River, and in the other they have no competition.

I do not say that prices of freight can or ought to be prorated exactly according to distance, for the handling of it at one point costs just as much as at another; and there are other considerations which must enter into the make-up of a freight bill. But what I mean to say distinctly is, that when a railroad company, having a customer in its power, helpless and dependent, levies black-mail upon him in the way of freight, I can see little difference between that species of robbery and that of the highwayman. The one presents his pistol to your breast and commands you to stand and deliver, while the other refuses to carry your freight unless you submit to extortion amounting to black-mail. In both cases intimidation is the means and money the end. It must not be understood that I am an enemy to railroads, but I war upon their malpractices as I do upon those of individuals. The position which I hold at the hands of a generous constituency will not allow me to do less, even if my own sense of justice failed to prompt me to it.

THE WEALTH AND CONSEQUENT POWER OF RAILROADS.

I advert to this point, with no purpose of creating prejudice against railroads, nor with any view of encouraging a spirit of communism as to wealth, but simply to show upon what they have fed, how they have grown, and to what proportions they may attain if pampered by the Government and allowed to eat out the substance of the people.

The most reliable data recently furnished as to their wealth sums up about as follows: 70,000 miles of railway with a professed capital of $3,200,000,000, their gross annual receipts amounting to nearly five hundred millions, exceeding largely the gross revenues of the United States Government, and equal to a per capita tax of $10 upon every man, woman, and child in the United States. To this must be added the vast amount of the public domain, secured by them through one device and another, aggregating 296,000,000 acres, worth about seven hundred and thirty-seven millions of dollars, equal to nearly one-half the whole public debt.

In many cases these lands are exempt from taxation for years to come, and about one hundred and seventy millions were granted, reserving no right to actual settlers upon any terms, except such as the railroads might prescribe. These lands in many instances have become very valuable since said roads have been built, and are held by the companies for speculation, the hardy pioneer not being permitted to enter their sacred precincts. Who will deny that railroad legislation in the past has established a landed oligarchy in our country, and revived in another form the old English feudal system, by concentrating this vast amount of domain in the hands of a few men, who I will not say are below the average of mankind in intellect and honesty, but who we all know take for their motto "Put money in thy purse," and who stand as a unit against the public in every contest it has with railroads—a combination which makes itself felt in all the walks and employments of life, which subsidizes the press, flouts the mandates of courts, employs not less than 30,000 men, enough to have controlled the last Presidential election, manipulates public opinion, controls juries by securing the best legal talent of the country, which talent is often elevated to the bench through their scheming and use of money. This combination controls telegraph lines, hires lobbyists, organizes syndicates, pools, cliques, and corners to compass its ends. In politics it is stronger than party, saying who shall fill the offices and who shall remain in private life.

In proof of what I have said I will let two of the railroad magnates speak for themselves. Jay Gould was called before said New York committee, and when asked if the Erie Railroad under his management interfered in politics, said:

> Certainly we do. If a friend is running for the Legislature or judiciary, we help him both with railroad votes and money.
> Do you consider that this cancels all obligations?
> Well, not always. My experience is that it is cheaper to buy a man after he is elected than before.
> What is your politics, Mr. Gould?
> In a Republican district I am a Republican; in a Democratic district, a Democrat; in a doubtful district, doubtful; but I am always an Erie man.

Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, in speaking of a prospective railroad commission, said, with a most remarkable air of nonchalance:

> Either the road must belong to the commission or the commission to the road.

Is it matter of special wonder, when men of their rank and position publish to the world such facts and opinions, that apprehension of pending evils should quicken the public pulse and demand legislative action for the purification and control of these corporations, which, though generally considered soulless, have through their charters secured the boon of immortality.

To show the estimation in which railroad companies are held, their usurpations of power, and the danger to be apprehended from them, I quote from a report made by a Senate committee raised to look into railroads and their management. On page 158 of that report they say:

> In the matter of taxation, there are to-day four men, representing the four great trunk lines between Chicago and New York, who possess, and who not unfrequently exercise, powers which the Congress of the United States would not venture to exert. They may at any time, and for any reasons satisfactory to themselves, by a single stroke of the pen, reduce the value of property in this country by hundreds of millions of dollars. An additional charge of five cents per bushel on the transportation of cereals would have been equivalent to a tax of $45,000,000 on the crop of 1873. No Congress would dare to exercise so vast a power, except upon a necessity of the most imperative nature; and yet these gentlemen exercise it whenever it suits their supreme will and pleasure, without explanation or apology. With the rapid and inevitable progress of combination and consolidation, those colossal organizations are daily becoming stronger and more imperious.

With such an announcement coming from a non-partisan committee of the United States Senate, is it not time something was done to check them in the exercise of unlicensed power? There is no want of power in Congress to interpose; the necessity for its exercise is most clear; the public interests demand protection; that protection can be secured alone through the action of Congress; longer delay will but intensify the evils and render the fight with the railroads more obstinate. Then, why not act promptly and energetically, thus showing to the world that we stand for the rights of the people, unawed by the power, unbought by the money, and unseduced by the blandishments of railroad officials?

I do not counsel hasty or inconsiderate action, which would bring only contempt upon ourselves and fail to meet the end contemplated. Let us give thought to this subject, hear the arguments for and against, discuss it freely in this House, and then agree upon some measure just and moderate in character to which the people and the roads can cheerfully subscribe.

While I favor such a course as indicated, I deprecate and will resist any intemperate and senseless crusade against these companies. They have invested their capital in public enterprises which have developed our western and southern wilds, which have extended civilization to our geographical limits and done so much to make our country great and glorious; and now, by intemperate, unwise legislation, to so hamper them as to destroy their usefulness and expunge their capital would set us back a century upon the dial of progress and civilization.

I repeat I am not now, and never have been, the least inimical to railroads, but have always been their fast friend, and what I have said on this occasion is as much in their interest as that of the general public. I speak advisedly, for I am from the people, of the people, with the people, and I know they entertain a general sentiment of kindness toward railroads; but it comes coupled with an earnest wish, ay, stronger than that, a determination to have justice and fair dealing at their hands.

Will the managers of these roads give heed to "the still small voice" heard in the land, and come up and help us to mature some legislation which will quiet these murmurings? Are they determined to listen to no proposition for a compromise, to make no concession, but push their schemes of wealth and grandeur until mob violence shall override the civil authorities, and they witness the destruction of their railroad tracks, iron bridges, round-houses, and palace cars?

I am yet to be persuaded that such men as Gould, Vanderbilt, Jewett, Huntingdon, and Villard, are so blind as not to see the cloud upon the horizon, so deaf as not to hear the distant thunder which portends the coming storm, and that they are so obstinate and self-willed as to yield nothing to public sentiment, if prompted by no higher motive than self-interest. I know, and they especially know, the power of money, but they and I know full well the impetuosity and danger of outraged public sentiment.

The use and ownership of property is but a conventional arrangement, and in this country as in others a class of people are found who acquiesce impatiently in this arrangement, especially when large amounts come to be centered in a few hands. These malcontents are daily making converts to their nefarious doctrines and have succeeded to an extent that few apprehend; and while I would yield nothing to their demands, and resist them with whatever of force is necessary to suppress and keep them under, yet it is the part of wisdom to afford them as little excuse as possible for any breach of law or order.

THE REMEDY.

I approach this part of the subject with great diffidence and distrust. In this case as in most others it is much easier to point out the evils and defects of a system than to offer a remedy for the same. The railroad problem, however, cannot be considered as wholly terra incognita, since of late much has been said and written on the subject, of which I avail myself in coming to my conclusions.

I premise by saying that all human affairs must be conducted by means of human agencies and instrumentalities, and while these may prove defective and uncertain, yet no means of a higher character can be employed. This Hall, the judge's bench, the jury-box, and the pulpit are all filled by men finite in capacity and fallible in judgment. But when we have selected the best men for these several positions, and have guarded them as far as possible against temptation to do wrong, we have gone to the verge of human perfectibility and there is no step beyond.

A NATIONAL RAILROAD COMMISSION.

I favor the establishment by law of a tribunal to be called "A National Railroad Commission," to act as far as possible in concert with the several bodies of like character now organized or hereafter to be organized by the several States. Said commission to consist of two branches, the first or higher branch to be composed of five eminent lawyers, not actively engaged in politics, to be chosen as far as practicable from the different sections of the country, with a salary each of $8,000 a year. It should be their duty to collect through the second branch, hereinafter to be named, information touching railroad travel and transportation in the United States, and upon all matters affecting interstate commerce, and especially as to discriminations in freight charges, special rates, and all other facts or circumstances tending to elucidate the management or practices of any or all railroads, so far as they affect the public interests through interstate commerce. And further, to ascertain what rate of freights, taken in connection with the amount of travel over these several roads, will pay to each a full and fair compensation upon the amount of capital actually invested in building, equipping, and operating the same, looking only to actual outlay, and having no regard to stock created by the process of watering.

Upon the coming in of said information, this branch of the commission to have power, and it should be their duty to fix a maximum tariff of freights for each road, said tariff to be altered or amended from time to time as said commission shall deem right and proper, and to remove all obstructions and hinderances to interstate commerce growing out of unjust discriminations, special rates, and other practices common to railroads. It should be the further duty of said branch of said commission to report annually at the beginning of each regular session of Congress to that body their proceedings in full, and recommend to Congress such further legislation upon the subject of railroads as in their judgment and experience they may deem necessary.

I would have these commissioners nominated by the President to the Senate, to be confirmed or rejected by that body, and to hold their offices during six years or good behavior. They should take an oath before entering upon their duties to perform them faithfully and impartially, and be subject to removal by the President, with the consent of the Senate, for incompetency, non-feasance or malfeasance in office.

The other branch of said commission I would have to consist of five other persons, to be appointed by the higher branch or a majority thereof, to hold their offices for six years, unless sooner removed by a majority of the appointing power, with an annual salary each of $4,000 and actual traveling expenses. Said second branch should consist of one railroad expert, one experienced merchant, one practical agriculturist, one manufacturer, and one miner, none of whom should own stock or be connected with the management of any railroad, except it might be the railroad expert.

This branch of the commission should be subject to the higher branch, and under its direction at all times, either collectively or individually; go to any required point, make investigations, obtain information by examination of witnesses, and from other sources as may be prescribed by law; receive charges and counter-charges for and against any railroad, and do and perform any other service which said higher branch may prescribe within the limits of its powers and duties. And all acts and duties performed, and all information obtained, should be reported to said higher branch, to be by it examined and acted upon. And any decision, order, or decree, or any action taken by said higher branch should be binding upon all parties, subject to the right of appeal to courts of competent jurisdiction, the party appealing first entering into bond with sufficient security to make good the order, decision, or decree of said commission, should the same be affirmed.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I have only outlined the organization, powers, and duties of this commission, leaving Congress to adjust the details should my views meet with its approval. I am not so wedded to my own views as not to fall in with others shown to be more practicable and just.

It may be asked, Why make one branch of this commission to consist entirely of lawyers? I have thought this proper; first, because nearly every case to be decided by that tribunal will involve law points more or less intricate, and about which lawyers would have to be consulted before any just conclusion could be arrived at. It is better, therefore, to select such men as Judge Gaston of Massachusetts, W. M. Evarts of New York, R. M. T. Hunter of Virginia, A. G. Thurman of Ohio, and Judge Cooley of Michigan, or others of like unimpeachable character and eminent abilities, to be paid a liberal salary and made to feel the responsibility of their positions and their engagements to administer justice to all parties rather than take the opinion and advice of some feed attorney, whose opinion would most probably be graduated to suit the size of the fee, or to meet the views and wishes of his client.

In the second place, such a tribunal would inspire all parties with confidence, both as to its capacity and honesty, and any opinion or decision made or delivered by it would be more certain to give satisfaction and secure acquiescence. The other branch of the commission should represent the different leading interests of the country, that all might have an equal opportunity of being heard and receiving justice. Hence, I would have that branch organized as above indicated.

It may be objected that the system is too expensive. But what does the outlay of a few thousand dollars amount to in comparison with the millions that must be saved to the tax-payers of the country? Meager salaries would be a mistake, from the fact that these would not command the best talents of the country for these positions, and would endanger the purity of the commission, having to deal with rich and influential corporations.

There is one other subject upon which I wish to say a few words, and about which I wish to put myself upon record, and then I am done.

RAILROAD INTERFERENCE IN POLITICAL ELECTIONS.

The testimony and admissions of Messrs. Gould and Vanderbilt, heretofore quoted, must have satisfied every reasonable mind that some more stringent law guarding the ballot-box against the corruptions acknowledged by them to have been practiced is absolutely necessary. With the amount of capital in their hands, according to their statements, they seem to have found it an easy matter to corrupt legislation in the States and in Congress. Having a knowledge of these things, should we not employ all the machinery and powers of the Government to stay this corruption and punish the offenders?

Let it be generally understood that members of State Legislatures and of Congress are in the market as sheep in the shambles, to be bought and sold by railroad and other corporations, and what becomes of our boasted free institutions and advanced civilization? What better is ours than the effete governments of by-gone ages, of which nothing is left but their painful histories, illustrating their follies and vices, and a few scattered remains of their once opulent and luxurious cities?

Suffer these corruptions in our country to go unpunished and unrebuked; let wealth subordinate legislation to its behests; let vice triumph over virtue, and honesty and morality be banished from our legislative halls, our court-rooms, our jury-boxes, and how soon may it be written of us as of one of them: Carthago delenda est.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Speaker, as members of Congress we have sacred trusts confided to us. A kind constituency have selected each of us to labor in their behalf in matters of grave concern to them. They expect us not only to think and talk, but to act. While they are generous, confiding, and forgiving, we should be watchful, industrious, and honest. While they look to us for protection and lean upon us for support, we should manfully battle with all who dare infringe their rights, and support them against every combination seeking to overthrow or destroy them. While they are engaged at home in their several avocations, making honest efforts to meet their obligations, whether private or public, whether in money or morals, we should guard them against the demands of the extortioner and the wiles of the political sapper and miner.

We hold our positions not merely as ornaments but to be made useful. We receive our pay not as a gratuity but for services promised to be rendered. We are expected to give less attention to minor matters and grapple at once with the grand problems of railroad supervision, finance, tariff, our shipping interests, an interoceanic railway or canal, improvement of the Mississippi River, a Southern Pacific railway, the proper count of Presidential electors, all of which, and others of equal magnitude, demand our immediate attention.

If the end of the session shall come and we have failed to act upon these, many a plaintive voice will be heard from the stump in the days of autumn making plea to that august tribunal, the people, for pardon and forgiveness, and offering "indemnity for the past and security for the future" in promises which will be accounted as worthless, and likely to go to protest. Let us avoid this humiliating position by a cheerful, prompt, and faithful discharge of present duties.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WELLBORN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print certain tables to accompany his speech on the apportionment bill delivered February 13, 1882. [See pages 1101 and 1102.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular work is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I move to dispense with the call of committees to-day for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the apportionment bill.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PRESCOTT, there were—ayes 120, noes 27.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion of Mr. PRESCOTT was agreed to.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees being dispensed with, the regular order is the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. No. 3550) making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress among the several States under the tenth census. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HERBERT resumed and concluded his remarks begun yesterday. The entire speech is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I had expected to discuss the Seaton plan of apportionment, but the injustice of that new mathematical invention has already been exposed. It is already dead, and only awaits the votes of this House to bury it so effectually that it will never be resurrected in future apportionment discussions.

But, sir, there is another question involved in this bill as fundamental and more important than the distribution of fractions. Congress is to fix the number of Representatives. My study of this question has thoroughly convinced me that the number of Representatives in this House is already very large; that, large as it is, we will not be able to prevent a material increase; that we will add largely to our present number; that future Congresses, influenced by the same motives which actuate us, will, unless restrained by constitutional inhibition, continue to add to the numbers of the House, and that thus great harm will come to the Government. I therefore on yesterday introduced and had referred a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution fixing a limit to the number of Representatives in this House. I propose to discuss in the time that is left me the reasons which seem to me to call for such a constitutional limitation, as well as the reasons which I think demand that we shall not now materially increase our numbers. The reasons for both will be found to lie in the same direction.

The bill of the majority of the committee fixes the members of this House at 329. What are the teachings of our experience with the number at 293? We all know that gentlemen now sit here for a whole Congress and do not know all their fellow-members even by sight.

Solely on account of our great numbers it has been deemed necessary to adopt arbitrary rules in order to prevent confusion. The Speaker for the most part may under the rule recognize whom he pleases. So it often happens when a subject is under discussion that gentlemen who might aid in a correct solution of the question and who desire to speak find it as impossible to get the floor and be heard as if they were in Canada. In fact a portion of the outer territory of this House is facetiously called Alaska. Members who sit anywhere in the outer rim of the floor find it impossible to hear and keep up with the routine business. They try for a while to listen; then giving up in sheer despair, they betake themselves to writing, reading, or talking. They are thus involuntarily compelled to contribute to the confusion they deplore. Would larger numbers cure all or any of these evils? Gentlemen who advocate a larger number point us to the British House of Commons, which contains 658 members. But while under our Constitution a quorum for business cannot be less than a majority, in the House of Commons a quorum for public business is but 40, and 20 for private business. So it happens that the average attendance there is less than here.

When a full House of Commons is required for business, and test questions come up, a bell is rung to bring in the members. It is impossible there, as it is here, that very large numbers should really participate in routine business or in actual deliberation. Let us look into this matter a little more closely as we find it to exist. Our committee and departmental duties engage the attention of members until twelve o'clock m. Then we meet. The average sessions of this House occupy four and a half hours. Deduct Mondays, on which we call the roll of States for bills, and little else is done, and we have but five days left of the week. It takes half an hour to call the roll as it is now. Deduct for roll-calls and viva voce votes, and votes by tellers, and reading minutes of proceedings, and it is safe to say that there are not during the week more than fifteen hours for debate. Give each member of the House one hour, and it would require nineteen weeks and two and two-thirds days, or, we may say, a five months' session, to give each member of this body as it now stands the floor for one hour. No wonder, sir, that the House is disposed to criticise harshly any member who occupies much time on the floor. It is true, sir, that most of the work of this body is perfected in committees, and it must always be so. But the numbers on committees are already sufficient, if not more than sufficient, for due deliberation, and this House recently decided not to increase them, and defeated the unanimous report of the Committee on Rules. I concurred in that decision and believed it was right.

Besides, sir, we do not want committees to do our legislation. The people do not elect committees. The Speaker makes them. A thousand influences may be brought to bear on him in the composition of committees. They may not reflect the will of the House. More than one unanimous report of a committee has been defeated here since this session began. And it ought to be so. The members of this House ought not to be so numerous as to render them incapable of deliberating and considering carefully every important measure. Legislation ought to represent the collective wisdom of the body of men sent here by the people—not the one-man power of the Speaker who makes up committees. Even if we elected committees they would not always reflect the opinion of the House. Every important measure ought to be subjected to the same crucial test. It ought to be the reflex of the deliberate judgment of the aggregate body of men sent by the electors to legislate for the country. And this body ought not to be so numerous as to prevent its forming this deliberate judgment. I believe the best result attained by any deliberative body ever assembled was the Constitution of the United States, which came from the hands of a convention composed at no time of more than thirty-eight members.

The increase of membership lessens individual responsibility and tends to extravagant waste of the people's money. The increased cost of membership is a large item. It is true the country is better able to bear this increased expense as it increases in population and wealth, but more members bring with them, according to the fashion of to-day, more and more schemes to deplete the Treasury.

I do not ignore, sir, the advantages there are in numbers. Large bodies are not easily corrupted, but by unduly increasing the numbers of a legislative body you encounter danger in this very direction. The larger the body the less the individual responsibility. And just in proportion as individual responsibility becomes less, and the difficulty of participating in the deliberations increases, just in that same proportion will members rely more and more on committees. More outside influences, sometimes only questionable, sometimes improper, and sometimes corrupt, can be brought to bear on committees. Numbers ought to be large enough to place the body of the House out of danger of corruption and yet not too large; for the intellect of the whole body, just as it came from the people, ought to be focalized on every important report from a committee.

It is said that when members are more numerous they know better the wishes of their constituents. This is true, sir; but the increased facilities of travel in this day enable members to acquaint themselves with their constituents and their wants; and knowing well the close scrutiny to which he is subject, interested motives, even if fidelity to trust is wanting, will prompt a Representative to guard with increased vigilance the rights of those sections of his district most remote from his home. What the people want is faithful service. The frequent elections of members of this House provided for in the Constitution were intended to give the people an opportunity to hold their Representatives to account. If they are unfaithful they will be discontinued.

We want to strike in fixing numbers the golden mean at which this House can do the most honest, efficient service to the people.

It seems to me, sir, surveying the whole field, that we are fast approaching if we have not already reached the limit to the number of Representatives in this House beyond which we should never pass.

In 1792, just after the Constitution was adopted, the membership of this House was fixed at 105. The population of the United States was then 3,929,214. In 1802 the House was raised to 141 members. Our population was then 5,294,390. In 1811 the House was raised to 181 members. Our population was 7,215,858. In 1822 we rose to 212 members. Our population was 9,633,822. In 1832 we increased to 240 members. Population was then 12,866,020. In 1842 the number of members was put back to 223, though our population had increased to 17,069,453. In 1850 the House rose again to 233 members. Population was 23,191,876. In 1862 the number became 241. Population was 31,443,321. In 1872 membership was fixed at 293, the present number, our population having risen to 38,558,371.

I have counted in this estimate the population of the District of Columbia and the Territories, but I have not estimated the seven Delegates from Territories who have seats on this floor and the right to participate in the discussions, and so make up, with the 293 members, 300 Representatives of the people.

Now, our population is 50,155,783. What number of Representatives will be now fixed upon we cannot know. I shall vote for one of the smallest numbers proposed; but it is safe to say we will have a further increase. The number recommended in the bill reported by the majority of the committee is 320, an increase of 27. So long as the power remains in Congress to fix the membership of the House there will be, as there are now, causes at work tending to further and still further increase that will be difficult if not impossible to resist. Every apportionment except that in 1842 has increased the number. The causes which operated in the past will operate in every future apportionment. Members are ambitious to continue in the service of their people. They are naturally averse to any apportionment that will cut down the electoral votes of their States. It is natural, too, for them to wish their districts to remain unchanged. They prefer, as relative gains in population are made elsewhere, that there should be increased representation elsewhere rather than a diminished number from their own States. This reasoning is powerful with the Representatives from a State which it is proposed to cut down. On the other hand, the rapidly growing States always welcome increased numbers; so that pride and ambition and self-interest all point to the path that has led us on step by step from 105 to 293 members, and is leading us now to a still higher number. How can those of us who believe the number is becoming too great hope, if we are not able at this time to prevent a large increase of membership, that any future House will be equal to the task? Ambition will be as powerful then as it is now; pride will be as potential then as it is now, and the prizes of office will glitter and dazzle then just as they do now.

It is always with a struggle that a people part with power, or even the semblance of power. But once since 1792 has the number of this House dropped back. That was in 1842. I do not believe we are less patriotic than the men of that day—I do not believe in the theory of degeneracy. But the fact that we are less able than the Congress of 1842 to consider calmly such a proposition is a warning to us that our numbers are already becoming too great and responsibility too much divided to admit of that patriotic deliberation demanded by the grave fundamental question that confronts us. I know of no instance in which the numbers constituting a State Legislature have ever been diminished. But, sir, their numbers are fixed by State constitutions. This is the only legislative body I know of that has the power of deciding on the number of its own members. Why should this power exist here? Why should the people of the States take up the matter—fix a limitation? [Here the hammer fell.] I would like five or ten minutes longer to finish my remarks.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Alabama ten minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HERBERT. I am obliged to the House for its courtesy.

Sir, looking at the lessons to be gathered from the history of our apportionments, I am constrained to believe that unless we do fix a limit in the Constitution, unless we settle the principle before future apportionment bills come up, there is no practical limit to the numbers we will have in this House. If no method is found to prevent this continued and continual increase we must build a new Hall. I might almost say that in the years that are coming we shall be obliged to wall in Capitol Hill to accommodate the House of Representatives. But, dropping the language of hyperbole, I think it is not too much to say that the turbulent scenes which so often detract from the dignity of this body will increase in geometrical ratio with every increase of membership.

If we wish to contrast the difference between large and small bodies go to the other end of this Capitol and mark the dignity and decorum prevailing there, and then look on the turbulence and excitement that kept us all day yesterday from progressing with business. There was a day, sir, when our predecessors prided themselves on their dignity. They sat in the House with their hats on, signifying that they were the Representatives of the people and did not deign to uncover in the presence of any human being. I have no doubt, sir, the decorum of the House in that day when their numbers were so much smaller was in marked contrast with the confusion that prevails here now.

I do not care to be pointed to the British House of Commons with its six hundred and fifty-eight members. I hope no American will ever hear in this Hall the cries of "hear, hear," the hootings and hissings and cat-calls that sometimes turn that body into a mob instead of a deliberative assembly. Our ancestors copied from the British constitution all that was worth copying. Let us, instead of copying the vices of the mother country or of any other country, set an example to the world. Let us show that we who know how to regulate liberty by law can also fix a limit to ambition when it is required by the good of the country. I believe that some such limit as that I have indicated should be fixed in the Constitution. The proposed amendment fixes the upward, not the downward, limit. I should gladly welcome the day when public sentiment would compel Congress to bring down the number below this limit, but I do not expect to see it. But I do think it possible, sir, that if we will adopt some such joint resolution as I have proposed, fixing some limit somewhere, public sentiment will have been so ripened by the discussion of this question that the States will adopt it. But if not now, attention will have been called to it, and it must be done in the future. If I have not misread the indications in the press, the best public opinion even now disapproves of the increase which I fear we are about to make.

In proposing this amendment I am not unmindful of the future and its prospects. This Government, which has survived petty commotions like the Shay and Dorr rebellions, the Hartford convention, the day of nullification, as well as the mightiest internal war that ever shook a continent, rests now on a firmer foundation than any government on earth; and it will increase until our fifty millions shall become a hundred millions—two hundred millions. The prophet would be dazed who should undertake to predict our future numbers. Territory after Territory is to come into the Union, State after State is to be annexed to our soil, and it may be that the child is now living who will see the flag that floats over this Capitol waving over the whole of North America. Sir, if we would only allow to the States the full measure of powers allowed to them by the law of their being and the Constitution of the Union, protect them in all their reserved rights to administer their own affairs, which is becoming more and more imperative as the States and the people increase in numbers and wealth and development, all the states of this western hemisphere might safely become the United States of America; and the interstate relations, the foreign relations, and the federal and national relations of all the people of all the States on this continent might be wisely cared for by one national Legislature sitting here in Washington.

But this, sir, would be impracticable if the body were so numerous that roll-calls would seriously impede and turbulence and confusion interfere with the dispatch of business. Every argument based on the future increase of business before this House is an argument in favor of keeping the number down to a point at which the House can deliberate and dispatch business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] has expired.

Mr. SHERWIN obtained the floor and said: I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. JOYCE.]

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Speaker, the bill reported by the committee is as dead as Julius Cæsar. It has been overwhelmed and crushed by the tremendous opposition that has been urged against it from all quarters of the Union. Yes, sir, it is dead, and now lying in state in this House awaiting burial. The sad procession will soon be formed to take it to its last resting-place. At the head of that procession will march the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCOID,] who officiated as midwife at the birth of this monstrosity, followed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRESCOTT] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE,] who acted as sponsors and godfathers at its unholy baptism, and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCCLURE,] who performed the delicate duties of wet-nurse, bringing up the rear.

This is the most bare-faced and deliberate outrage ever attempted in any apportionment bill which has been before Congress from the organization of the Government down to this time. You may talk of land-grant steals; you may talk of salary grabs, of cipher dispatches, of the Oregon larceny and theft in 1876; you may talk about the Morey letter, but, Mr. Speaker, they all dwindle away and pale into insignificance when compared with this scheme to rob, actually rob, five States in this Union of a fair and just proportion of representation upon this floor and in the electoral colleges. This, sir, is a scheme, as it looks to me, to rob these States and disfranchise a large number of their people. I do not desire to find fault with the committee, or in the least impugn their motives, for they are all honorable, high-minded gentlemen, and intended, undoubtedly, to do what was right and just; but, for some unaccountable reason unknown to me, they lost their reckoning entirely and wandered away in the dark, and up to this time they have been unable to bring themselves back and start off in the right direction. As I said, I do not impugn their motives, but I do question their judgments, and as they were discoursing learnedly about the mysteries and beauties of this new method, I fancied I could detect "a kind of confession in their looks which their modesty had not quite craft enough to cover."

This, Mr. Speaker, is an important question. It involves the question of the representation upon this floor of thirty-eight sovereign independent States; and not only that, sir, but it involves this representation for ten years to come; not only in this House, but in the electoral colleges of this country; it involves the question of revenue; it involves the question of the tariff; it involves the financial question; it involves every question that will be brought before Congress for consideration and determination for the next decade.

It is, then, of the highest importance that a just and equal apportionment be made, so that each State may have its full share in the enactment of laws and the choice of the Executive.

This bill, sir, reported by the committee, takes the representation from the small States and gives it to the large ones; and this is claimed to be done under the sanction of the Constitution and the plausible plea of doing justice. They have a plan, they say, which does exact justice between these States. "Oh, what a goodly outside falsehood always hath!"

I regret exceedingly that I am forced to take issue with the committee on a measure which ought to be so framed as to meet the approval of every member of the House, but I am compelled to resist the passage of this bill. I am compelled to raise my voice against this terrible wrong to the people of my own State. I dare not sit quiet in my seat and suffer it to become a law. Why, sir, the passage of this bill would disfranchise 24,000 Vermonters, who are as much entitled to representation as the people of New York, Pennsylvania, or Illinois. I am not only compelled to resist this bill, but I am in duty bound to present to the House some feasible plan of apportionment which under the Constitution shall give each State her fair and just proportion of representation. The situation in which I find myself reminds me very forcibly of a story told by John Van Buren, when he was advocating the election of his father on the free-soil ticket in 1848. He said, as an excuse for his great zeal in the campaign, that he found himself very much in the condition of the boy who had tipped over a load of hay on which his father was riding, covering the old man all up. As soon as the boy could recover himself he set to work with a will to release his father, and was pitching in with great earnestness when a gentleman, coming up and seeing the boy working and sweating to get the hay off, said to him: "What are you about, my man? Why are you so hard at work?" To which the boy replied between breaths, as he kept on pitching. "I am obliged to do it; dad is under there." [Laughter.] And so am I obliged to resist this bill and urge the adoption of my 365 substitute, not only to protect my own people and save our present representation, but also to protect the people of the whole of the New England States, who will be injuriously affected by the passage of it.

I wish you to look, Mr. Speaker, for a moment at the provisions of this bill and the several amendments which have been offered to it. Not one of them but deprives my State of 1 Representative and leaves us out in the cold. Not one of them but cuts down the representation of the State of New Hampshire, the State of Maine, the State of Rhode Island, and the State of California. Why, sir, it seems to be a blow aimed at New England, a conspiracy to disfranchise and humiliate her people, for it takes the Representatives which are filched from that section and awards them to the great States of New York, Illinois, and Pennsylvania. My friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] agreed to sit here by me during my speech, but I have just discovered he has gone. [Laughter.]

I wish to ask the committee and gentlemen who support this bill why this crushing, powerful blow should fall upon the people of New England? What is New England, and who are her people? Can gentlemen on this floor wipe out the history of this country or blot from memory and recollection the proud record of their deeds? Do they forget that it was the men of New England who, on the 10th day of May, 1775, captured the strong British fortress upon yonder border—the strongest British fortress then on this continent—severed the line of British communication between Montreal and New York, and saved the then exposed colonies? Have they so soon forgotten that it was the brave yeomanry of New England that made it possible for Commodore McDonough and General Macomb to send that memorable dispatch to Congress on the 12th day of September, 1814, saying, "The Almighty hath vouchsafed us a signal victory on Lake Champlain!" Have you not been told, Mr. Speaker, that it was a Vermont judge who demanded from the haughty slave-holder a bill of sale from the Almighty himself before he would allow a poor colored man to be carried from the free soil of that glorious old State back into slavery? Where is the man who dares to utter one word against New England? Where is the miscreant who would dare to tarnish her fair fame or mar the glory of her noble record? Sir, in the language of one of her gifted sons, "Go to every battle-field where heroes have poured out their blood in defense of human rights and human liberty, and find one if you can where the bones of New England's sons are not moldering in one common consecrated grave with those from every other State in the Union."

"Go to your gallant Navy, that has upheld the honor of your flag on every sea and on every lake, and find one, if you can, whose decks have not been washed by New England blood." And this is the section of your country and this the people you propose to rob and humiliate by depriving them of an equal share in the representation on this floor and in the electoral college.

Sir, in behalf of and in the name of the people I in part represent, I protest against it.

Vermont early took her proud position in the very zenith of our political firmament, and there she continues to shine even unto this day; and accursed be the man and palsied the hand that dares attempt to dim her splendor or obscure her brightness. It is for this people that

I plead to-day; it is in their name and in their behalf that I demand justice at the hands of the American Congress—a people who have always stood, and do to-day, ready to spend the last dollar of their money and to shed the last drop of their blood for the honor of the flag and the perpetuity of this glorious Union.

Now, Mr. Speaker, looking at the question in this light, what could I do when gentlemen seriously urged the passage of this bill? I ask gentlemen around me on this floor, what could I do but to raise my voice in earnest, emphatic protest against this great wrong and propose a measure which would do equal and exact justice to all?

The Constitution tells me that Representatives upon this floor are to be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers. Having that principle of the Constitution before me, I sought for the number and the method that would accomplish that result in accordance with the fundamental law. I sought for that number which would give my State, as well as all the other States, a fair and equal representation upon this floor and in the electoral colleges. I commenced with the number 325 and followed up the line until I struck the number that would do it; and that number I found to be 365. If I had found a number which would have saved to Vermont her present representation before I reached 365, I should have adopted it; but I did not. Then, Mr. Speaker, I examined into the history of prior apportionments and inquired as to what had been done with respect to this great question in former years, and I found that in 1787 the ratio was fixed at 30,000 to every Representative, which gave us 65 members. In 1792 the ratio was fixed at 33,000, and that gave us 106, thereby increasing the number forty-one that decade. In 1802 the ratio was retained at 33,000, which gave us 141 members, making an increase of 35. In 1811 the ratio was fixed at 35,000, which raised the number to 181 members, an increase of 40. In 1822 the ratio was raised to 40,000, which gave us 210 members, giving an additional force in that decade of 29 members. During the two decades from 1832 to 1852 the House contained 240 members; but in 1853 it was reduced to 233. In 1862 the ratio was fixed at 128,215; the number of members was again raised to 241. In 1872 the ratio was fixed at 135,293, which added 51 members to the House, making the number 292; and with Colorado, admitted since that time, with 1 member, fixes the present House at the number of 293 members.

Sir, I examined carefully all these acts of apportionment for the purpose of satisfying my mind as to the best method by which we could make a fair and equal distribution of political power upon the basis of the last census, and I found that from the origin of the Government down to this time, when some new and strange light seemed to break in upon the Census Committee of this House, which was not vouchsafed to others, that the old method, as it is called, has been adopted by all former committees and by every Congress, and that every apportionment has been made in accordance with it. I therefore concluded to adopt that method in my computation. I have examined it fully and can see no objection to it. I was satisfied with it, and in the examination I made I compared every number and figured it through, and find that there is no other number which would so nearly do exact justice to all the States and leave so few people unrepresented as the number I have mentioned. I obtained the ratio by dividing the whole number of the population of the United States by the number of Representatives, 365, which I sought to place upon this floor.

Why, sir, this old method which I adopted was considered and adopted by this House in the last Congress, and not a solitary member on this floor from any section of the country objected to it. It was the method adopted by the committee and consented to by the House. It was agreed to by General Walker, advocated by both sides of the House, and deliberately sanctioned by everybody. It was argued fully and thoroughly and nobody then objected to it, and no one then pretended that there was any new-fangled or mysterious method or legerdemain by which it is now sought to fix the apportionment by this bill; but on the contrary it was then admitted to be nothing but a plain, simple, mathematical calculation, merely a matter of figures that a schoolboy could work out.

I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe there are ten men in this House who can explain the method or principle upon which this bill is based. There are not ten men in this House who can make this apportionment on this new-fangled plan and explain it, while, sir, there is not a page on this floor but can, if the process always followed by this House in past years in making an apportionment is adhered to, figure it out as well as you can or any other man.

After the thorough examination I have already referred to, I made up my mind that I would adopt the old method and stick to it. I did and I now have the result before me.

Before going further into this discussion I desire to explain some points in connection with this bill even at the risk of going over ground which other gentlemen have occupied before me. I wish to call the attention of the House to some of the beauties of this new system which is presented here by the committee, in doing which I will endeavor to be very brief.

I find that the new method takes 1 Representative from California, 1 from Florida, 1 from Rhode Island, to say nothing about the other States, and gives them to Illinois, New York, and Pennsylvania. Now look at the figures. Under the new method each Representative would have in California 172,938 persons behind him; in Florida he would have 269,493 persons behind him; in Rhode Island, 276,561; while in Illinois he would only have 146,565; in New York, 149,496; and in Pennsylvania, only 147,685. Now, sir, do gentlemen claim that this is equal or fair? Let the figures speak.

Under the old method, as I figure it out, each Representative in California would have 144,115 persons behind him; in Florida, 134,746; in Rhode Island, 138,265; in Illinois, 153,893; in New York, 154,026; and in Pennsylvania, 152,960. Thus you can see very readily, Mr. Speaker, that the old method would place the representation of these States almost upon an equality, or as nearly so as is possible in making any apportionment.

Again, Mr. Speaker, under this bill New York on an even division gets 32 members, with a remaining fraction of 145,751, which is 8,534 less than the ratio, 154,285. Now, if we give her 1 member for this fraction she will have 33, and yet under this new method the committee have awarded her 34. Pennsylvania on an even division gets 27 members, with a remaining fraction of 117,196, which is 37,089 less than the ratio. If we give her 1 member for this fraction she will have 28, and yet the committee give her 29. Illinois on an even division gets 19 members, with a remaining fraction of 146,456, which is 7,829 less than the ratio. If we give her 1 member for this fraction she will have 20, and yet the committee give her 21.

These three States are given 84 members by this bill, and yet they lack 53,452 of enough to entitle them to 81. In other words, they have by this bill three members more than their population entitles them to, while Vermont, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island are robbed of the same number. It gives those three large States representation for 516,307 persons more than they have, while the three small States have 184,383 persons that are left unrepresented.

Again, Iowa has a member for a fraction of 81,765, while California is denied 1 for 93,269. Massachusetts is given 1 for a fraction of 85,950, while Rhode Island is not allowed 1 for 122,246. Michigan is given 1 for a fraction of 94,087, while Florida is counted out with a fraction of 115,208. These are some of the beauties of this bill as computed and made up under the new method.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word in regard to my amendment or substitute providing for a membership of 365. I found my ratio under this old method to be 135,264. Then dividing the population in each State by that number gave me the even number of Representatives, which was 348. That gave me 55 additional Representatives, which, with 17 more to be made up from the fractions in the different States, gave me 365, as shown by the following table:

I have here a list, which I will not stop to read, of States which gain by my plan, showing the number of members that each State gains, the whole amounting to 72; and of this number the South gains 29 and the North 43, as shown by the table:

This apportionment made by my substitute does equal and exact justice to all, it gives to the large States their due and does not rob the small ones.

Now, sir, a word in regard to the size of the House. And I ask no man to follow my plan or to vote with me unless his own judgment dictates that that is the wisest course to pursue.

In my own State, with a population of 332,286, we have a house of representatives composed of 232 members; one member from every organized town in the State. Did you ever hear, gentlemen, of the Vermont Legislature being bought, bribed, or intimidated? Mr. Speaker, the history of the world attests the truth of the old adage that in a multitude of counselors there is safety.

Great Britain, with a population of only a little more than 31,000,000, has in her House of Commons to-day a representative force of 658 members. And, sir, the British House of Commons has stood as a rock and bulwark of defense to English popular liberty from the very moment of its organization down to the present time; and its very strength and power and virtue consist in the fact that the numbers are so large that no power can overcome it, no threats can intimidate it, and no bribes can tempt it. In France, with a population of less than 37,000,000, they have 532 members. In Italy, with a population of 28,000,000, they have 508 members. And in Germany, with a population of a little over 42,000,000, they have 462 representatives in the popular branch of the Legislature.

Some gentleman asks me what I would do with 365 members in this Hall? I will tell you what I would do with them. I would in the first place remove the partition on the south side of this Hall and let it extend back to the outer wall of the building, so that the light of day and the sun of heaven could get in here. I would ventilate this "tank." That is what I would do first. Next I would pass a law by which Congress would be relieved of the pressure and labor of every private bill that is brought here.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would consent to that.

Mr. JOYCE. I am with you. We would then have nothing but public business to attend to. Look at the calendars of this House. When Congress adjourned on the 4th of March, 1881, we had nine hundred and sixty private bills on the Calendar, and to-day we have one hundred and seventy on the same Calendar.

I would in the next place remove these desks and put in benches, as they have in the British House of Commons, so that this Hall should be used for the transaction of public business, and not as an office for members or a smoking place for loafers.

Then I would do another thing. I would print the Journal and abolish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which is now used for the glorification of the members of this House, and if any man wanted his remarks taken down or his speeches printed, let him put his hand in his pocket and pay for it. If you will do that, if you will follow the recommendations I have made and increase your number to 365 members, you will do exact and equal justice to every State of this Union, and no session of Congress will extend beyond the 1st of May in any year. You will not reduce the representation of a single State, but you will give to every State as large a representation as she has now; you will do justice to the large States by giving them all the additional members to which they are entitled, and not commit robbery by stealing from the small ones. It is said Vermont runs behind, that she does not keep up with her sister States in population. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is true, and there is a reason why she does not. Sir, look over this House and the Senate; cast your eyes over this great country of ours if you please. Go into the great States of the Northwest, and tell me who you find there occupying the bench, practicing at the bar, filling the pulpit, and teaching in the schools and colleges. Who are the men that stand in the front rank in every great moral reform and business enterprise? You will find that these men hailed from Vermont. If they did not their fathers or their mothers did.

Chester A. Arthur, the man who stands at the helm of State, who with steady eye and strong arm has shunned the rocks and held the ship of state to her true course during the storms of the past six months, is an honored and worthy son of the Green Mountain State. Assuming the duties of that high position under the most trying circumstances, and at a time when the great grief of the nation had nearly driven men mad, he has borne himself with so much wisdom, prudence, and propriety, and managed the affairs of this great nation with so much skill, discretion, and true statesmanship that to-day he is respected, trusted, and loved by the people of the whole country, North, South, East, and West.

Look, sir, at the men here upon this floor who claim Vermont as their birth-place; who still love her green hills and her bright vales, her summer sunshine, and her winter storms, and whose hearts glow with pride and affection at the mention of her name.

She has given to Iowa KASSON and CUTTS; to Kansas, HASKELL; to Massachusetts, RANNEY; to Michigan, WEBBER and HORR; to Missouri, HASELTINE; to New Hampshire, RAY; to New York, PARKER; to Wisconsin, CASWELL, and to Dakota, PETTIGREW. She gave also to the Senate the two giants of the west, Douglas and Carpenter, and to-day she claims SAWYER and KELLOGG as her sons.

Now, sir, I call upon these men to-day to rally to the rescue of their native State, to stand up in her defense and protect her from the danger by which she is now threatened.

No man can estimate the power which Vermont and her sister States of New England have exerted in the formation and preservation of this Government. No man can measure the benefits you have received from the skill and inventive genius of that people.

Why, sir, I sometimes almost doubt whether without New England character, New England pluck, New England virtue, industry, civilization, intelligence, perseverance, and morality, you would have been a free people to-day.

Mr. HOOKER. Do you not think Vermont has already a very large representation?

Mr. JOYCE. Now, in the light of all these facts, do you wish to cut down the present representation of our gallant little State? Do you wish to humiliate her by this scheme of robbery? Certainly not, if it is for the benefit of the great States of New York, Illinois, and Pennsylvania.

But, sir, what we now witness is only history repeating itself; it is the old story over again; it is New York trying to gobble up Vermont. When they attempt this, let gentlemen remember the efforts of their ancestors in this direction and take warning. Let them call to mind the days of 1778 and 1779, when they made a desperate effort not only to rob us of our lands but to get jurisdiction of our people, and were treated to the catamount skin and the "beech seal" by Allen and Warner and Baker.

The sublime patriotism, unflinching courage, and manly independence of the early settlers of Vermont challenge the admiration of the world. Treated with coldness and neglect by the Continental Congress, with Great Britain threatening them with fire and sword upon the north, New York with all her power and wealth making gigantic efforts to steal their land and imprison the settlers on the west, New Hampshire looking with longing and anxious eyes upon the Connecticut Valley on the east, and greedy Massachusetts making insidious inroads upon their territory on the south, those brave and hardy mountaineers, single-handed and alone, fought their own battles, conquered and overcame all their enemies, and presented Vermont as the first star to be added to that glorious constellation whose brilliancy to-day illumines the whole earth and carries joy and hope to the struggling millions of mankind in every portion of the world.

Is it any wonder, then, that Vermonters are ahead the world over? Can it be thought strange that she sends out men to command senates, to adorn and give wisdom and dignity to the bench, and to take the lead in every field of genius, enterprise, and labor?

Her people are the offspring and descendants of heroes, and their spirit of opposition to every wrong and determination to defend their rights against any power was crystallized into immortal verse during the terrible days of her early trials.

Let the inspiring words of her poet wake the echoes to-day. Let them be the watch-words and rallying-cry to Vermonters whenever their rights are invaded or the State in danger. Let them ring along down the centuries, imparting hope and courage to our friends and warning to our enemies.

Let Clinton and Ten Broek, with bribes in their hands,
Still seek to divide us and parcel our lands;
We've coats for our traitors, whoever they are—
The warp is of feathers, the filling of tar.

What seek they among us? The pride of our wealth
Is comfort, contentment, and labor, and health,
And lands which as freemen we only have trod,
Independent of all save the mercies of God.

Though savage and wild be this climate of ours,
And brief be our season of fruits and of flowers,
Far dearer the blast round our mountain which raves
Than the sweet summer zephyr which breathes over slaves.

Come York or come Hampshire, come traitors and knaves,
If ye rule o'er our land, ye shall rule o'er our graves;
Our vow is recorded, our banner unfurled,
In the name of Vermont we defy all the world.

[Great applause.]

[At the expiration of the twenty minutes allotted to Mr. JOYCE, the following proceedings took place:

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALDRICH in the chair.) The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Vermont may be extended for ten minutes.

Mr. JOYCE. I do not trouble the House very often.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman being extended for ten minutes?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry before that extension is granted. I want to know if it comes out of the six hours allowed by the committee for debate.

The SPEAKER. It comes out of the six hours, but it does not come out of the time of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SHERWIN.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. I will give the gentleman from Vermont my time.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I understand I have the last hour of those six hours. If this extension is to come out of my time, I must object.

Mr. SHERWIN. A member of the committee, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. TYLER,] has thirteen minutes of his time remaining, of which he is willing to yield eight minutes to his colleague.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized for eight minutes longer in the time of his colleague.

At the expiration of the eight minutes,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOYCE. I should like to have about ten minutes more.

Mr. HAZELTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended as he desires.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Vermont for ten minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOYCE then resumed and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. TYLER. I believe I have five minutes remaining, and I give that time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] Before doing so I desire to send up to be printed in the RECORD an amendment which I propose to offer to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ALDRICH.) That will come in under the rule.

The amendment proposed by Mr. TYLER is as follows:

Amend by striking out in the fifth line of the first section of the bill the words "three hundred and twenty" and inserting the words "two hundred and ninety-four;" also, by striking out all of the first section after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Alabama, 7; Arkansas, 5; California, 5; Colorado, 1; Connecticut, 4; Delaware, 2; Florida, 1; Georgia, 9; Illinois, 18; Indiana, 12; Iowa, 10; Kansas, 6; Kentucky, 10; Louisiana, 5; Maine, 4; Maryland, 5; Massachusetts, 10; Michigan, 10; Minnesota, 5; Mississippi, 7; Missouri, 13; Nebraska, 3; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 7; New York, 30; North Carolina, 8; Ohio, 19; Oregon, 1; Pennsylvania, 25; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 6; Tennessee, 9; Texas, 9; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 9; West Virginia, 4; Wisconsin, 8."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It occurs to me that all these sectional appeals are as much out of place as they are unnecessary. I do not believe there is a member of this House who either wants to rob any State of its representation or by any possibility could be induced to do any injustice to any other State. If the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] fancies that the State of New York wants either his representation or his land he is very much mistaken.

When I heard the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] appealing for mercy, I was moved. I saw that he was a man of peace, that he wore the garb of righteousness, and that he had fallen among thieves and robbers. And he turned his appealing eyes to this side of the House and begged us to protect him from the wrong which was being done on his own side of the House. More than that, I could not help feeling, considering that this was his first term of service, that it was a pity he should not have had a second chance, and that he might say in the language of the old epitaph:

If so quickly I am done for,
I wonder what I was begun for.

[Laughter.]

But the question is one simply of mathematics; and to that I ask the attention of the House for the very few moments at my command. The Constitution enjoins a mathematical rule, which is to apportion representation to numbers. That rule can be executed absolutely; but it involves assigning to each State a fractional representation. Now, there is nothing impossible in fractional representation. Each State might elect its members to represent the whole numbers of the quotient and one member to vote the fractions. The fractions could be voted on every bill, and could be computed at the desk; so that the absolute rule of the Constitution is not only practicable, but is easily enough put into execution. But it is inconvenient. The argument against it is purely the argument ab inconvenienti.

Now, when you depart from the absolute rule, any rule that you may adopt is an approximation to the absolute rule. The nearer the approximation, the more we come into accord with the requirements of the Constitution; and that is all there is of these propositions. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE,] who argued in favor of the new rule, declared that it was a mathematical rule. He was mistaken. There can be but one mathematical rule, and that rule will give fractional representation. But the Seaton rule is founded on a fallacy which is not mathematical at all. The Constitution says that representation shall be proportioned to numbers. Now, numbers are positive, existent realities, not imaginary and negative quantities. The Seaton rule proceeds upon the theory of giving representation to negative quantities. It takes the quotient which approaches nearest to the modulus—the nearest below the modulus; which means that it gives representation deliberately to negative quantities. That is contrary to the Constitution, which requires that the representation shall be given to positive quantities.

Now let us see how it works in practice. Taking 320 members as the number for comparison, after you have given New York all she is entitled to as a whole number, after you have given her an additional one for the fraction, which already gives us some representation for non-existing population, then you give another member by grace—out of nothing—not representing a single human being upon which to build even a pretense of representation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the gentleman from New York be allowed five or ten minutes more, not to come out of the time of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SHERWIN.] The same favor has been allowed to other gentlemen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman from New York will proceed for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now, the Seaton rule affects only six States. The rest may be eliminated. It gives one extra member to New York, one to Pennsylvania, and one to Illinois for population which, as I have said, has no existence at all. No one pretends that there is any population to represent the three members thus assigned to those three great States. For this there is no warrant whatever in the Constitution. What does it do on the other hand? It takes away one Representative from California, leaving 93,269 unrepresented, one from Florida, leaving 115,208 unrepresented, and one from Rhode Island, leaving 122,246 unrepresented, making 330,713 positive, existing persons wholly and absolutely unrepresented, and giving to New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, representation for 516,346 people who never have existed and who are purely negative quantities. Of course the demonstration is complete. The Constitution never contemplated non-representation.

But some one will say, "If you give an extra member to Florida, Rhode Island, and California, respectively, you will then have represented on this floor people who do not exist." Not so. You first give those States this representation because of the larger number who otherwise would have no representation; and, as to the small balance which is left, you have minimized the inevitable variation which you are compelled to make from the standard modulus by the fact that you have to deal with fractions; and the Seaton rule itself proceeds upon the theory that you shall minimize these disturbances which have been called anomalies, contradictions, paradoxes. By the old method you do minimize them; by the new method you aggravate them, because you provide representation for 516,000 people who do not exist, ignoring 336,000 people who do exist. Adopting the old rule you give representation to only 129,000 people who do not exist. Therefore I say you minimize, not aggravate, the non-representation by the old rule; you aggravate, not minimize, the non-representation by the new rule. It seems to me the demonstration is thus complete. That is all I propose to say in reference to the Seaton rule, which is founded on a misconception of the spirit as well as of the letter of the Constitution.

If I may be permitted, I will add a word as to large and small Houses. I have no fear of large Houses; I have no fear of the increase of this House, although as we are now organized and as the machinery of this House is constituted I shall vote for the smallest number of Representatives I can get. I regard every addition to this House, organized as it is, as an injury to the public interests. But if you will change the mode of doing business in the House—if you will refer the great business, the appropriation business, to the Committees of the Whole House and assign definite hours in the day when that business shall be considered, and then if the public business outside of the appropriation business can be carried on at definite and fixed hours, when gentlemen interested in the progress of legislation will attend to it—I have no fear of a House twice the size of this. But as at present organized the whole machinery of Congress is an institution of "How not to do it." It ought to be a great institution for attending to the business of the country. That business is suffering in all directions. I warn gentlemen that the prosperity which now happily prevails throughout the land will not last unless this House takes up the revenue and financial questions and provides an outlet for the coming flood of manufactures which cannot be consumed in this country. I ask them, sir, to look a little to the future.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The Chair will bear with me for a moment. If they will take out the private business from the House under the bill which I had the honor to introduce at the beginning of this session, on the first day of the session, I mean the Potter bill—and here let me pay the tribute which is in the heart of every member to his great and precious memory—if they will adopt that bill and clear this House of all private claims, and take up the question of revenue reform which demands immediate attention and action, we may save a calamity greater than that which overtook this country in 1873 and which endured until 1879.

And I ask gentlemen to come up to this work in the spirit of self-denial, of patriotism, of statesmanship, and of foresight necessary to prevent a great calamity for which we shall justly be held responsible. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWIN. Mr. Speaker, I propose to be very brief. We have had enough of debate. What may be the individual opinion of any member of the House as to the merits of the different theories of apportionment under discussion matters little. That the House will adhere to the method followed for the last forty years is evident; and that being so, it is but a waste of time to discuss them any longer. Our duty is to select a number and then make the apportionment upon the principles so well understood.

But I hope I may be pardoned a few words relating to the processes referred to. That the old and the new method may both be productive of injustice has been shown in this debate, and examples might be multiplied to almost any extent. That practical injustice may be done by the method adopted in the first and the four subsequent apportionments is clearly seen and frankly admitted. As injustice may be done by any method, the injustice done cannot therefore of itself be proof of an erroneous method. Which is the constitutional method cannot be determined by assertion or demonstrated by ridicule.

The very forcible argument of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCOID] cannot be overthrown if you admit his first premise—that we must first select a ratio, measure, or common divisor with which we can measure all the populations of the States and which will produce the number of Representatives desired without being obliged to give representation to fractions. The point in issue is whether we should follow that method, or whether we should first divide the whole representative population of the country by the number of members desired and take the resulting quotient as the measure or ratio. The latter method will of necessity require us to give Representatives to fractions to make up deficiencies and that is the method which the House will adopt. It is very certain that the Constitution does not in terms direct how the apportionment shall be made.

But it has not yet been controverted that Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Edmund Randolph favored the principle upon which this bill is drawn; the Second Congress indorsed it; the first five apportionments were made upon it. The principle of this bill was the practice of the Government for fifty years. So when gentlemen inveigh against the bill they strike at statesmen who helped make the Constitution and men who have a reputation of having known what it meant.

We admit the weight of the arguments made on the memorable and profound debate in Congress in 1832, upon which afterward the present method was founded. We bow before the profound knowledge of Webster, Calhoun, Everett, Benton, Ewing, Hayne, Prentiss, who supported the "old" method; but we reflect that Marcy, Clay, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, and others advocated the principles of the committee's bill.

It was remarked during the discussion in 1832 that the amount of unrepresented fractions had increased with each apportionment as the number of the States and the size of the House increased, and under the method originally adopted they would still increase. That fact was the principal cause which moved Congress to change the rule. The old original constitutional interpretation broke down under the burden of injustice it was imposing upon the less populous States. The cold conclusions of arithmetic melted before the rays of sympathy for the weaker States.

And now I want to say that I fully share in that sympathy. And the practical injustice done to Rhode Island and Florida has taken away from me all enthusiasm for the committee's bill. I am glad that those States are to retain their present representation, and may they never have less.

Whatever method is used is but an approximation to a just apportionment. Since the abandonment of the original method there have been two processes. In 1842 Representatives were given only to fractions greater than one-half. But in 1852 and apportionments since made the largest fractions have been taken until the required number of Representatives were obtained. It frequently happened that fractions less than a moiety were taken. There are two new methods proposed by way of amendments to the bill; one by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] and the other by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. THOMPSON.] Both aim at greater equity in the final decision of political power. It may be that at some future apportionment an entirely different method may be adopted from any yet followed.

I desire now to refer briefly to the bills before the House as affecting the number proposed. At the last session the debate was altogether upon the number. At this session that subject has received but little attention. There are bills now pending upon a basis of 294, 307, 316, 319, 320, 321, 322, 324, 325, and 365—ten different numbers. They are all upon what is called the old method, except 307 and 320; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has announced his intention to abandon the new method in his bill for 307. The question then which the House must determine is, What shall be the number?

The minority bill passed by the House last winter is now conceded to have been as nearly just between sections and parties as any bill could well be. Had it not been fair to the other side it could not have been passed by the aid of Democratic votes. Had it been unfair to this side we should not have advocated it at all. The bill was passed with the sole view of satisfying party demands upon both sides, and it ignored the claims of States which were asserting that they were unjustly affected by its provisions. Iowa, Wisconsin, and Kansas complained that they were not allowed another member each, but they yielded what they considered their rights in order that a bill might be passed at that time. We may, in discussing the bills now before the House, assume that the 319 bill is from a party stand-point perfectly fair, and can compare the other bills with that as a test of their provisions, for I take it that party interests have not entirely been lost sight of.

The bill for 307 members on the old method is unfair, as it gives a total gain of 9 in the South over the present apportionment, and only 5 to the North—a difference of 4 in favor of the South. Indiana, New York, Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont each lose 1, while Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Massachusetts, Georgia, Missouri, South Carolina, and others do not gain at all. Another paradox is also revealed at that point. Georgia would be entitled to 10 in a House of 306 members, but only gets 9 in a House of 307, and has a fraction of 94,809.

At 316 the South has an advantage of 3, as at that point the total gains in the South are 13 and at the North 10. At that number no States lose except Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, while between 316 and 319 Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts come in respectively with 21, 28, and 12 members—a gain of 1 to each.

The House is perfectly familiar with what the bill for 320 under the new method does for all the States. At 320 under the old method Iowa is admitted with another member. At 321 Wisconsin, and at 322 Kansas, are admitted, both Republican States. This is a Republican advantage of 3. Yet I think that those States should be admitted as a matter of simple justice to them, without reference to politics and in spite of politics. During the last decade Kansas has increased in population 173 per cent., or 36,439 per year. Should she increase at the same rate for the next decade, she would be entitled to at least 9 Representatives in 1890. At 319, 320, and 321 she gets but 6. By going to 322 she gets 7. Iowa and Wisconsin, States full of vigor and rapidly advancing in population, come in, as we see, just before her.

In order that these States should have justice done to them, I introduced a bill at the beginning of this session providing for a House of 322, and it is now pending as an amendment to the bill. It ought to pass. There are interests besides those of party, and some of those are the interests of States. In making apportionments Congress has frequently favored the small States and the new, fast-growing ones. They have recognized the future course of empire and welcomed them in advance. Bear in mind that I do not ask you to give them a member, but simply to enlarge your House by 3, and they will then be entitled by right to all they will have. Can you refuse this moderate, this just demand? I have been told by some members in conversation that they thought a House of 319 members was large enough and they were not inclined to vote for 322 on that account, and besides, that 319 had been once accepted by the House and it ought to be again. I know that we of this side were satisfied with the 319 bill last winter and were gratified at our success in passing it when we reflected upon the gross injustice of the bill at that time proposed by the majority of the other side. But now we desire not only to do justice to parties, but to three large, young, and prosperous States of the ever-advancing West. We ask you who have shown such ardent sympathy for Rhode Island and Florida to extend your sympathy to the banks of the Mississippi and the Missouri, and be simply just and kind to your sister States of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Kansas, within whose borders live those whom you have sent forth from your homes to subdue the wilderness of the West. [Applause.]

Permit me to refer to the following extract from a few remarks made by me in the House on the 3d of last March, to show that I then thought that such a case as I now propose was one that called for favorable action by the House.

> Having said so much about the uncertainties and confusion caused by fractions, and the fallacies that are supported by them, I will add that it seems to me that there are two cases in which Congress might relax its rule in the furtherance of justice; that is in the case of small States, which ought to have every benefit they can obtain from them, and new States, or those fast increasing in population—States like Rhode Island, Vermont, and Connecticut on the one hand, and Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, and Minnesota on the other, as probably within a year or two each of the last four States will have increased sufficiently to entitle them to another Representative.

The House has decidedly expressed its intention to stand by the small States; let it now be fair to the new.

Mr. Speaker, the number for which I have contended is so fair that I am sure it would be adopted but for one reason, that is the party advantage it gives to the Republicans. I recognize and respond to your demand for fairness, and I now propose to meet it fully by making the House consist of 325 members, and thus bring in three Democratic States to balance the three Republican States. At 323, South Carolina would come in; at 324 Texas would be admitted, and New York would close up the line at 325. The first two would be certainly Democratic, and I am informed by gentlemen from New York that the additional member in that State would go to New York City or Brooklyn, and would be Democratic. Then, too, Texas is another of the fast-growing States. Her population increased 95 per cent. during the last decade, and is now increasing faster than ever. South Carolina increased her population 40 per cent., and is in all fairness entitled to another Representative. By adopting 325 justice will be done to all these young, prosperous commonwealths, the party equilibrium of the House will be maintained, and perhaps a prolonged contest over some other number avoided. Any number which deprives three States of the Representatives they ought to have will certainly provoke a determined opposition.

I again hear the objection that the House will be too large. In 1870 it was increased by the addition of 50 members. This number would increase it but 32, while the population has increased nearly twice as much as in the previous decade. The tendency is to repress the increase of the House, at the same time there must necessarily be a gradual increase for many years probably until our House has reached the size of the popular branch of parliamentary bodies in Europe. But it will be many years before that period will be reached, and it is not a subject which need concern us; besides it is impossible to select a number much less than 325.

I think we should come to a vote at once upon this matter. Many State Legislatures are now anxiously awaiting our dilatory action before they can district their States. They are urging prompt action and I urge it. I hope that when the previous question is called for in three hours from now that it will be ordered without delay. It need not take us long to select a number, and I hope that that number will be either 322 or 325. You can pass no other bill.

Mr. CALKINS. Before the gentleman takes his seat I would like to ask him a question. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that with 325 members Texas, South Carolina, and New York would each be entitled to a Representaive?

Mr. SHERWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALKINS. What I want to get at is whether they will be entitled to a Representative according to the fractions, they having the largest fractions remaining?

Mr. SHERWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALKINS. What is the fraction left over which would entitle these States to an additional Representative?

Mr. SHERWIN. I do not recollect the exact number.

Mr. CALKINS. Is it much less than one-half?

Mr. SHERWIN. It would be but a very small amount.

Mr. CALKINS. That number, 325, then, would fix the political standing of the House as the gentleman has stated in his speech?

Mr. SHERWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALKINS. Why, then, is not that a fair number?

Mr. SHERWIN. I hold that it is a fair number.

Mr. HAZELTON. It is the fairest and cleanest thing that can be done.

Mr. SHERWIN. I would say that the apportionment in 1842 provided representation for moieties only; the apportionment of 1852 provided for the representation of fractions less than a moiety. Since then the rule has been to take the largest fractions, whether they be moieties or not, until the required number was reached.

Mr. CALKINS. In this case, then, do I understand that there would be a full moiety in each of these cases?

Mr. SHERWIN. There would be a fraction over, I think, in each case, except New York, which would have 4,000 less than a moiety.

I now yield ten minutes to my colleague from Iowa, [Mr. CARPENTER.]

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to contribute only one or two observations to this debate.

I think it is settled beyond controversy that the old system of computation will be adopted by this House in preference to the new. This, in my judgment, is not because the old system is more exact mathematically than the new, but because, and it is honorable to American manhood, the members of this House will not submit to deprive the weaker and the smaller States of what may seem to be their just representation. Assuming, then, that the old system of computation will be adopted by this House, I want to say, now and here, that it seems to me to be the plain path of duty of this House to adopt that number which will give the States having the largest fractions remaining additional representation in this House, with the smallest aggregate loss in the States that must necessarily lose fractions. I believe with my friend [Mr. SHERWIN] who has just spoken so ably and well, and who has almost taken the speech which I had intended to make out of my own mouth, that 325 is the number that should be adopted by this House. I am not afraid myself that this House will become too large to do business.

Alexander Hamilton in his letter upon this very question, found in the Federalist, prophesied that within a century from the adoption of the Constitution this House would consist of 400 members; and that is almost the only prophecy that Alexander Hamilton has made that has not been fulfilled.

This number, 325, is the nearest to the constitutional requirement and to the requirement of exact and equal justice. Let me read from the Constitution. I read from the first sentence of the second section of article 14 of the amendments:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

Now I read from the old section:

> The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative, and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

Now, if we could find a number exceeding 30,000 that would exactly divide all the States, leaving no remainders, that number would meet the exact requirements of the Constitution, and that would do exact justice to all the States. But we cannot find that number in the very nature of things. Therefore it is our duty to exhaust the possibilities in that direction; and so long as you leave a State with a fraction in excess of the moiety of the ratio adopted you have not exhausted the possibilities in that direction. So long as you leave a State with a large fraction standing right upon the threshold of receiving an additional Representative you have not exhausted the possibilities in that direction.

I desire now to speak for a single moment in reference to the States which by adopting any number below 322 would be most unjustly treated. One of these is my own State of Iowa. Suppose the number 319 should be adopted. You would leave Iowa with a fraction so large that at 320 she would be entitled to another Representative. She is a new and growing State. If the census could be taken in that State to-day she would be entitled to eleven Representatives and there would still be a fraction remaining. She has under the census a small fraction short of 1,700,000 people. Before 1890 she will have a population of more than 2,300,000 people; leaving her before the decade shall close with nearly 600,000 people unrepresented upon this floor. I speak of her particularly, but equal injustice would be done to Wisconsin and Kansas.

Now, I do not believe that an apportionment bill is a teeter-board on which to balance political parties, and yet I think that if we can find a number which will do justice to both sides, and which will be received by both sides and accepted by both sides, and meet the requirements of the Constitution and these other requirements of which I have spoken, that should be the number adopted. I want to say here and now that this is not a political question. I would vote just as readily to give a Democratic State its fair representation for a fraction as I would to give it to a Republican State. I am a Republican. I believe earnestly and sincerely in the principles of the Republican party; and so believing, I believe that before the next ten years shall close the Democratic States in this Union will be represented on this floor by a divided representation. Democrats believe, no doubt, as sincerely in their doctrines as I do in Republican doctrines. If you have the same faith, do justice to these States. If you have the same faith that your principles will advance in the Republican States as I have as to the advance of Republican principles, then vote for a just representation to those new States, though they may be Republican. I invite you to come to Iowa; her school-houses, her court-houses, and her hustings are open to you. It is good ground for missionary effort; but you will never commend Democratic principles to Iowa by voting to deprive her of what she regards her just representation upon this floor.

Mr. SHERWIN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I am obliged to my friend for his courtesy. Five minutes will suffice for all I wish to say. When this question ran in the higher mathematics it was involved in complication and mystery. The freaks and fantastic tricks of figures worked wondrous results. Few understood them, and as for myself I claim to belong to that great and respectable majority of the House who had not the slightest comprehension of these processes. Planchette would be quite as reliable. When it came to decimals it was not entirely clear; but when our friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] brought it down to simple, vulgar fractions, we could all understand it. The principle that if you claimed and were entitled to half a man you should have a whole one, and if you were not entitled to half a man you should not claim any, seemed to be practical, common sense, and just. Now, it is a little singular that while it did not affect his own State the gentleman from Michigan should have found a number —321—which, while it gave each State entitled to more than half a Representative a full one, it gave no State which fell below that measure any claim to one.

But, sir, I did not rise to discuss these methods. They have been abundantly and ably discussed, and each doubtless has merits. Whether the number be 321 or 322, or whether it goes as high as 325, I do not believe any great practical injustice can be done. These Representatives will be located in the new States of the Northwest and Texas and other States. It is nearly two years since the census was taken. Sir, two years is a generation in the growth of population in the young States of the Northwest. We need have no fear of doing injustice on that line. Could the census be taken to-day, northern Wisconsin, with her forests pierced by new railroads, her mines opened up, her farms cleared, her ships afloat on the waters of Lake Superior, her docks, lumber camps, and busy people, would show that she is amply entitled to the nine members whom I trust you purpose to give her. She only fell 400 behind the ratio entitling her to nine members, even on this new plan, as compared with Illinois.

What I say of Wisconsin I am glad to be able to say with equal force of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, and the coming State of Dakota. Whoever has traveled in those States or that Territory during the last summer has seen place after place rising as if by magic—young cities as we call them in the Northwest, villages as you call them in the East—of 1,000 or 2,000 inhabitants, where three years ago not a single human habitation stood.

Now, sir, let us take 325, if that is the number, or any number down to 320. This apportionment is for ten years. The tide of immigration is going like a torrent into these great and free and prosperous regions of our country, where justice will be appreciated and political power will never be abused.

One word in conclusion. I would have no desire if I could to cut any gentleman off in his remarks after the courtesy accorded to me; but I second the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SHERWIN.] I hope the determination may prevail here that after debate closes to-day, even though we sit through the night, before this session of the House adjourns this bill shall be passed. [Applause.] It is votes we want, not voices. Now let us commence with 325 and see if we can agree on that; if not, let us continue to vote until we do agree; then send this bill to the Senate, and let it go thence to the waiting Legislatures, some of them in session and soon to adjourn. That is practical, and I hope the House may regard it as advisable. [Applause.]

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 699) for the relief of Theophilus P. Chandler;

An act (H. R. No. 1024) for the relief of Sydney P. Luther;

An act (H. R. No. 1670) for the relief of E. J. Gurley;

An act (H. R. No. 2796) to appropriate $5,000 for packing, transporting, and arranging certain agricultural and mineral specimens;

An act (H. R. No. 2341) for the relief of colored emigrants; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 89) to print certain eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Fernando Wood, Matt. H. Carpenter, and Ambrose E. Burnside.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SHERWIN. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DEERING.]

Mr. DEERING. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that our duty in this matter is very plain and simple. We are acting under a command of the Constitution of the United States. That command is peremptory. Now, sir, what does that require of us? It is, that we shall apportion the Representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers. How shall that be done? We should first find such reasonable number and such method as will distribute the Representatives justly and equitably and at the same time leave the smallest possible fraction unrepresented to each and every State; for we cannot possibly avoid fractions in some cases.

Now, sir, the question arises, has any such number been found? I answer by saying that I believe such number has been found. The debate has already determined, and I think conclusively, that the new or Seaton method of computation is fallacious and would do great injustice to some of the States, and for that reason should be discarded by the House, as it no doubt will be.

And in my judgment the debate has also demonstrated that we must soon settle down either upon the number 325, 322, or 321. After hearing the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHERWIN] and examining his tables, I am myself satisfied that the number 322 most nearly complies with the requirements of the Constitution and comes nearest to doing equal and exact justice by the several States. I am well satisfied after listening to the speech and examining the tables of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] that the number 321 would also meet the requirements.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House especially to one important point, and it was for that purpose chiefly that I took the floor. That point is the just claims of the growing States of this country. I say to you, gentlemen, that any proposition which would fail to recognize and protect the rights, the exceptional rights, of those States the population of which is rapidly increasing should be at once and forever rejected by this House.

We are now fixing an apportionment that is to extend into the future, that is to stand for a full decade. As I have said, any proposition that would leave large numbers unrepresented in the great and growing States of the West should be discarded at once and forever by this House, and I hope will be. The force of this remark will be appreciated when gentlemen compare the tables which I submit showing the respective populations and the changes in population within the last decade in the several States:

States.	Total population.		1880.
	1880.	1870.	White.	Colored.

Wisconsin	1,315,497	1,054,670	1,309,618	2,702

In some of the States, as will be seen, the changes within the last ten years have been almost imperceptible, while in other States, like Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Wisconsin, the population has increased at rates varying from 50 to 200 per cent. Can we ignore these facts? Can we be blind to them in deciding upon this apportionment? I hope gentlemen will carefully consider this point before the subject is finally disposed of.

One word more and I have done. I wish to say to those gentlemen who feel like returning to the number 319, which was considered in the last Congress, that if that number should be adopted it would disfranchise what in 1880 was a majority of the ratio required to send a Representative here in three of the States; and if the census could now be taken that would be found to be equal in number to the full ratio required to send a Representative here. I say to this House that to put that injustice and that wrong upon the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Kansas (for those are the three States to which I refer) would approach very near to an outrage. Have we any emergency that requires such action? For my own part I think not, and I hope the House will so decide.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PIERCE] as entitled to the floor.

Mr. PIERCE. I yield fifteen minutes of my time to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRUMM.]

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, there seem to have been three methods or plans sugested, and only three, in the apportionment bill and amendments now before us. The first is the method proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CONVERSE,] in which he suggests an idea to which the greatest objection that may be urged is the fact, as I intimated in the question I asked him, that in the electoral college as great injustice will be done under his system as under either of the other systems which have been suggested. Under his system in certain years and in certain States more power would be given than in certain other years.

In the next ten years we will have (at least in all human probability before another apportionment bill becomes a law) three Presidential elections. In each of those Presidential elections the proper and equal representation of each State would be utterly impossible under his system. For instance, in the next Presidential election by that system Rhode Island would be given a power one-fifth more at least than she is entitled to in the electoral college from this branch of the national Legislature. In the Presidential elections next after that it would deprive Rhode Island of almost 50 per cent. of her power. What would be done in the third Presidential election no one knows, and no one can tell just now. So I say there is manifest injustice in that system, and there is no way that I can see by which you can remedy the evil.

Mr. CONVERSE. May I be allowed to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly.

Mr. CONVERSE. The gentleman mistakes my proposition in this: when an additional Representative is once granted to a State it is not taken away at any time. Therefore, if Rhode Island is allowed an additional member during the next Presidential year, she would continue to have that additional member to the end of the decennial period. There is no diminution of her representative power under my system, but if once acquired it remains the same to the end of the decennial period.

Mr. BRUMM. If that be so, then I do not see that there is any more justice in his plan than in the plan I have suggested, for the State would either have too much or too little, and the matter is as broad as it is long. It has been the habit of most of the gentlemen speaking upon this subject to deliver a valedictory on the bill reported from the committee, which I find no fault with. I will take up no time on that bill or its peculiar method or system.

We have then remaining the old system, as it is termed. In justification of that system, my friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR] said that ever since the greenback craze he has had a perfect dread of figures. Now, I am not surprised at that at all, because if there is one fact well established it is the fact that figures never lie, and that truth is sometimes dreadful indeed to some gentlemen on the floor of this House.

Now, let us see as to the figures. Under the old system Florida and Rhode Island would have an increase or a loss, by reason of remainders or fractions. I shall call it rather a minus and plus, for those terms will be, perhaps, better understood. By giving Rhode Island 1 member, her plus would be 122,246. By giving her 2, her minus would be 32,029. Now, I propose to deal at this time exclusively with the minus, not with the plus. While it is true that her minus is but 32,029, while that of the next State under consideration, namely, California, will be 61,020, yet the minus of 61,020 relatively will not be so large as the minus 32,029.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] started out by criticising the language of the Commissioner of the Census in this, that the Commissioner in his report, or letter, used the term "Congressional districts;" and says the gentleman from Rhode Island, "The Constitution knows no such thing as a Congressional district." In that the gentleman is right. The Constitution knows no such thing as a Congressional district. Then he says that it does recognize States. I say that in the apportionment on this floor the Constitution does not recognize States. In this body there is no recognition of States. What does the Constitution say?

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.

It says further:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, &c.

Then what does it say as to the Senate?

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State.

There is the great difference between one branch and the other in this legislative body.

Now if Rhode Island's minus of 32,000 were cut up and the State allowed two Representatives, her minus to each ratio would be half as much as 32,000. If you give her but one, she has a plus of 122,246. Now will any gentleman on this floor contend that you must take 122,246 inhabitants of the State of Rhode Island, block them off in one corner of that State and give the 154,000 their Representative? No man contends for so ridiculous a proposition. What then? Why the population is absorbed and brought together in one lump, and then divided, and each division is the ratio of representation to which the people of that State, not the State, are entitled. You cannot say to Pennsylvania, "You must block your State into twenty-eight separate blocks and then take another block, and for that, it being a fractional part of the State, you shall or shall not be entitled to a Representative." Neither can you draw from each representative district a certain number of people and say that they shall have the benefit of this fraction or have no representation. Therefore, I say it is the people all the time—the people in the State, it is true, according to their number, that are to be represented and not subdivisions of districts or States. Now if that be true, what are you going to do with these smaller States?

Let me say right here that while the Constitution says that each State shall have two Senators, and that no matter what the size of these States are they shall have the same representation in the electoral college, i. e., the same power in electing the executive, which is the more formidable and more powerful branch of the Legislature and includes the entire executive power of our Government, I say that notwithstanding the Constitution says that they, the smaller States, shall have an equal representation in the Senate and the electoral college with the largest States in the Union, it also says that Congress shall make this apportionment according to the number of people in the several States; and inasmuch as we have this power, I say as these smaller States have already this superabundance of power we should hew clean up to the constitutional line, keep them to their minimum, and give them not one member more than they are entitled to under the Constitution. They have too much power already; and if there is anything left it should be given to the people of these United States who are deprived of their share of power in the other co-ordinate branches of the legislative as well as the executive. I am not going to contravene the Constitution; I am not even going to criticise it at this time; but I am here to say that where a superabundance of power is given to any State, and we have the power under the Constitution to at least in a small degree equalize these powers and give other States their proportion of what little power is left, it becomes our duty as Representatives here to give that little remaining power to those people who are not so well represented or not so powerful in the other two co-ordinate branches of the legislative and executive.

Why, sir, these little States are like the flea that marks the lion's sleep. States like little Delaware, that has less people than my county, stand up against the mighty State of New York and constantly cry out "Oh, preserve the autonomy of the States." But the country asks why should we not preserve the autonomy of the people of this Republic? And if we do that we will give them the power that they have under the Constitution. We will say to Delaware, and Rhode Island, and Florida, "Take your pound of Senatorial and electoral flesh, but do not ask us to give you one drop of our Representative blood; you have too much already."

Now, what is the remedy? Let us see. I find that taking as a divisor the number reported by the committee, i. e., 320, California would get 5 members, with a plus of 93,000; that Florida would get 1 member, with a plus of 115,000, &c. Just here let me say as to the 1 additional member over and above the 1 they get for their plus, given under this bill to each of the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, I think that assignment is unjust. I, for one, as a Representative from Pennsylvania, do not claim this extra member for that State over the one for its large plus or fraction. I want only even-handed justice, so far as I am concerned, in this matter. But there are other States that do not get their proportion; and among them the smallest is California. Therefore I would leave this bill just as it is so far as the number is concerned—the divisor 320; I would take 1 from New York, 1 from Illinois, 1 from Pennsylvania, but I would not give an additional member to Rhode Island and Florida. Why should we give to those that have the lion's share already?

Every member on this floor agrees that there can be no even division of the people of the several States into ratios; i. e., there must be larger or smaller remainders; therefore some of the people of some of the States must lose while others will gain relatively. Now, then, the only question for us to decide is whether those people of the smaller States who have already got greater power in the co-ordinate branches of this Government shall also have the surplus relative power in this the popular branch of Congress, or whether we will reserve in this one branch so much of this surplus power as we may under the Constitution and give it to the people of those States justly entitled thereto.

But how will we do then? We will take the next highest fractions after passing those States that have extra members for their fractions, and cutting out the States which get the lion's share, where do they belong? As I say, they belong, among others, to California.

She is entitled to 1. It is true her minus is larger than that of Rhode Island. It is true her minus is 61,000, but that minus should be divided by five, or under the other tabulation by six, and then the minus would be as six goes into sixty-one, and it would be something like 10,000.

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PIERCE. I will yield whatever further time the gentleman may require.

Mr. BRUMM. I thank the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the minus therefore, though it may be 61,000, would be the proper or real minus, if States were represented here, but as the people are represented here, you must subdivide the whole minus by the full number of ratios contained in the whole number of people, less the fraction or minus. Therefore the proper minus of the people of California is as six goes into 61,000, and which would leave her minus only about 10,000. In justice, therefore, you should give that 1 to California.

What next? The highest of the fractional parts that are over belong to Wisconsin, California, and Kansas. I would give 1 to Wisconsin, 1 to California, and 1 to Kansas. Then you would give it to those States whose plus, excepting Rhode Island and Florida, are the largest, and whose minus, without any exception, are by far the least; and then when you divide that plus or that minus among the whole people you will find Florida and Rhode Island are in no way entitled to them, and that these three extra men belong to Kansas, California, and Wisconsin.

Mr. Speaker, that would be justice, that would be equity, and that would be law under the Constitution.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. I take the floor, and yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Speaker, it is not probable that this body will have to consider a more important question than that now pending. In it are involved sacred principles which lie at the foundation of republican representative government. It is the object of our Federal Government to guarantee equal and exact justice to each State of the Union and to every citizen.

With a view to this prominent end the framers of the Constitution have in their wisdom been careful to preserve a just equilibrium of power among the States in the two branches of the National Legislature.

There are times and places for the consideration and discussion of political principles, party issues, and party exigencies with propriety, but such questions should have no place here now. It is our duty as the servants and trustees of the people we represent to rise above party necessity, sectional prejudice, and State pride, and being actuated by that broad spirit of patriotism which inspired the fathers, to promptly perform the work before us with fidelity to our trust and with an eye single to the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

The plain mandate of this instrument is that "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers."

Does the bill before the House obey this mandate? To give the figures of the bill is to answer that it does not.

Under this bill Florida, with a population of 269,493, and which now has 2 Representatives, is to have but 1; whereas Illinois, with a population of 3,077,871, now having 19, is to have 21, or 1 for every 146,565 people. In other words, we are told by the advocates of this measure that in Florida it shall require 122,928 more people to be entitled to a Representative than in Illinois, and therefore the weaker State must give up one of her Representatives in order to add more and disproportionate power to the stronger, and that too in violation of every principle of equality and fairness.

Rhode Island, with a population of 276,531, with only 2 Representatives, must give up one in order that the powerful State of Pennsylvania, now having 27, with a population of 4,282,891, may be increased to 29, and that henceforth in Rhode Island it shall require 128,846 more people to be entitled to a Representative than in Pennsylvania.

Contrast California with New York, and the inequality is scarcely less striking. It is actually sought to give these great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois a greater number of Representatives than the number of times the number 154,285, fixed as a basis for a Representative, is contained in the aggregate populations of these States and their fractions added, whereas in the smaller ones whose representation is sought to be diminished large fractions are to be left unrepresented, notably in Florida and Rhode Island, each with an unrepresented fraction of largely over 100,000.

When we are brought face to face with these glaring inequalities the question naturally arises, Wherein is the new method better than the old?

From what stand-point have gentlemen looked in order to see that during the entire period of the Government's existence those who have preceded us have apportioned the Representatives among the States by a fallacious method? It is true the old method has its imperfections, and so will any method that can be devised, but the imperfections of the old are dwarfed by the monstrous absurdities of the new.

But what reasons have been assigned to justify this process of absorbing the power of the weaker States by the stronger?

I shall notice in this connection some of the reasons frankly urged by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRESCOTT] who has charge of the bill. I read from his remarks in the RECORD. He says:

> But one question presented is whether New York, with her 5,082,871 inhabitants, with an assessed valuation of property subject to taxation of $2,686,139,153, whose citizens hold $219,264,250 of the nation's bonds, or about one-third of all held by citizens of the United States, being nineteen times as many as are held in California, fifty-two times as many as are held in Rhode Island, eight hundred and thirty-one times as many as in Florida; who represent one-fifth of the bank capital of the country and have and use one-quarter of its entire circulation; whose citizens hold nearly three-fourths of the whole gold certificates of the Government, and within whose State limits were collected in 1881 $141,958,855.90 of the customs, or nearly three-fourths of all in the country; whose banks paid the Government $2,042,838 in taxes, or one-fourth of all paid; the citizens of which pay $17,233,393.75, or one-eighth of the internal revenue of the Treasury, shall by a just apportionment, according to numbers, because of the largest ratio of apportionment, receive an increase of one thirty-third of her representation, or shall California receive an increase of one-fifth, Florida of one-half, or Rhode Island one-half, as you shall give to one of them the Representative taken from New York.

The objection is that the pending measure does not make a "just apportionment according to numbers;" and to show that it is conceded that it does not, and that it is sought to justify it on other grounds, I further quote the remarks of the gentleman from New York. He says:

> Am I met with the claim that wealth, the sinew for the support of the Government and her bulwark of defense, counts nothing in representation?
> That such was not the design of the founders of the Constitution is self-evident. Taxation and representation they considered joint factors in their blows for freedom. They reiterated in the original wording of the Constitution—
>
> "Representation and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States * * * according to their respective numbers."
> But they went further, when they added—
> "Which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons."
> This added three-fifths of the described personal property of the States to make up the representative population of the States. This property in 1790 had 12 Representatives; in 1800, 16; in 1810, 20; in 1820, 22; in 1830, 25; in 1840, 21; in 1850, 20; in 1860, 18, and it may be her material wealth and position in the Union in 1790 gave her her extra 3, in 1800 her extra 5, in 1810 her extra 7, and New York her 2, in 1820 Alabama and Virginia their 1 additional. Be that as it may, this is not a new claim. In 1791 Mr. Barnwell asserted that extent of territory should be regarded in apportionment.

I have not investigated the statements of the gentleman as to the wealth of the people of New York; but granting that they are correct, I submit the question, What have they to do with the apportioning of Representatives "among the States, according to their respective numbers?"

If the Constitution had said that the apportionment should be made among the several States according to the number of bonds, amount of stocks, or gold held by the people thereof, then the argument would be applicable.

Are the favored classes, on account of their millions invested in untaxed bonds of the Government, to be still further favored at the expense of the toiling masses?

Are the hoarders of wealth to receive more consideration in the eyes of the Government than the laboring producers of wealth? In the name of justice I protest against the doctrine.

Are we to increase the power of the national banks of New York by giving them undue representation upon this floor by reason of their gold, stocks, and bonds?

Where do we find warrant for such action? Has not the country recently seen demonstrated the danger of the menacing power of these institutions over its legislation in the fate of the funding bill passed at the last session of Congress, a measure manifestly in the interest of those who bear the burdens of the Government?

The only class of property that was ever considered under the original clause of the Constitution in the matter of representation was slave property. That having been transformed from property to citizenship under the Constitution as amended, no class or amount of property can be considered for the purposes of apportionment of Representatives—nothing but "numbers" of inhabitants. Does the gentleman accept the amendment to the Constitution? We do.

But in his argument to base representation upon wealth, at least in part, he designates it as "the sinew for the support of the Government and her bulwark of defense."

I grant that wealth is important to the support and defense of the Government. I would not advocate any unjust discrimination against it; nor is it to the interest of the country that dangerous jealousies should be aroused by an unjust claim in its favor. The surest support, the surest "bulwark of defense" for the Government, is a contented, enlightened, and prosperous citizenship, abounding with that patriotism which can be inspired alone by equal laws conceived in wisdom and administered with justice and moderation—a citizenship who recognize in the Government a protector and not an oppressor.

We have often heard upon this floor and elsewhere warnings from trusted statesmen of the dangers of too much centralized power in the Federal Government; but equally dangerous to the States and to the rights of the people would be the gathering of undue and disproportionate power to the stronger States at the expense of the weaker. I do not believe that the people of these great States or a majority of their Representatives upon this floor are prepared to sanction the pending bill.

Another objection to it is that it unnecessarily increases the aggregate number of Representatives. Can any good reason be assigned why this body should be increased from 293 to 320? Will the twenty-seven additional members make the body more efficient, promote economy or the dispatch of the public business?

To show what reasons have been given for this increase, I quote again from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRESCOTT.] He says:

The only safety of the Treasury of the Government is in a much larger House than now. In the continued flood of bills seeking distribution of the nation's wealth bankruptcy sometimes appears inevitable, but the long, oppressive waiting of many a worthy claim for final allowance proves the safety-valve of the Treasury.

Is it to be the deliberately settled policy of the Government that worthy measures shall be defeated and justice denied, not for want of merit, but by "oppressive waiting?" Is the Government thus to deliberately become an oppressor of its citizens who have claims admitted to be "worthy?" Is the good to be stifled with the bad, and are both to perish alike by reason of "oppressive waiting?" Would it not be more in accordance with right and justice to fairly investigate measures presented in Congress and separate the worthy from the unworthy? Let each measure stand or fall upon merit or demerit.

Reference has been made to the facts that Great Britain, with a population of 31,628,338, has a House of Commons of 658; that France, with a population of 36,905,788, has a Chamber of Deputies of 532; that Germany, with a population of 42,727,360, has 462; and that the Lower House of Italy, representing 27,769,475, is composed of 508; but it has not been shown, nor even asserted, that these bodies are rendered more efficient and trustworthy by reason of their large numbers. Nor has any reason been stated why we should follow the examples of these governments of the Old World. It must be remembered that in some of these assemblies at least a number much smaller than a majority constitutes a quorum and the members receive no salaries.

Again, this proposed increase is objectionable on account of the unnecessary expense that will be thereby incurred. There are now over 100,000 Federal office-holders in the employment and pay of the Government. They have been multiplied until their maintenance necessitates the imposition of onerous burdens upon the people. Believing it would be far better to reduce the number rather than increase it, I shall favor the proposition to recommit the bill, with the hope that some such measure as that proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] may be adopted, or that we may at least have an apportionment that will be equitable and fair; one that will preserve the beauty and symmetry of the complex system of our grand Republic of States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 184) for the relief of Charles P. Chouteau; and

A bill (S. No. 668) to authorize Dr. Daniel R. Appel, United States Army, to receive pay for discharging the duties of physician to the Mescalera Apache Indian agency of New Mexico.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am exceedingly grateful for the kindness of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] in giving me a part of his time, and shall discuss my amendment fixing the number of the House at 325.

I have the honor to represent in this body probably 90,000 voters and nearly half a million of people. The measure under consideration is to fix as with bars of iron for ten years to come the power of the several States in the electoral college and on this floor. No other subject before Congress or that can be introduced so directly and vitally affects the interests of those for whom I appear. And it is because of this fact alone that I ask the attention of the House.

TWO DIFFERENT STEPS IN APPORTIONING.

In making an apportionment there are just two acts, and only two acts, to be performed. The first is to decide what the total number of Representatives shall be. The second is to distribute this total number among the States according to their population. And these two acts are essentially distinct and different. The first is a matter of choice, the second a matter of arithmetic. The decision of the first is as free as the will of man; the decision of the second is as rigid as are the iron walls of a water-pipe. When you have once determined the whole number of Representatives, and have subjected that number to the operations of mathematics, the exact quota of each State is inexorably ground out as by machinery, and neither the wishes nor interests of any human being can alter the results.

Whether a man shall jump from Goat Island into the dashing current of Niagara is a matter of choice. He may, or he may not, as best pleases him. But after he has made the leap, no power on earth can prevent his plunge over the cataract. That is not a matter of choice, but of resistless force and absolute certainty. The difference between the two acts of apportioning is exactly similar. You may select one total or another, as pleases you best; but after the House has made its choice then the assignment of the respective quotas to the several States is absolute and resistless under the eternal laws of figures. And yet these two wholly different acts have somehow gotten mixed together and confounded in the minds of gentlemen after a marvelous fashion. They are as different as fire and gunpowder. If you apply the one to the other an explosion will certainly follow. Yet, fire is not powder; nor is the act of determining the total number of Representatives the same as the act of distributing the shares to the States.

It is a singular fact that by far the greater part of the discussion which the committee proposes to allow has been over this second and incidental act. I will not suggest that the "new method" of proportioning quotas was injected into this measure for the same reason that a tub is sometimes thrown to a whale, because I do not believe that any member of the committee would do such a thing, and because I am satisfied that the majority of these gentlemen sincerely approve that method. The debate has been shaped by other motives and its course has been natural. And yet the fact is that the real questions involved by an apportionment have been touched only incidentally, and many of them not at all. The secondary and long-settled question of how you will distribute the quotas has been the only prominent subject of debate. It has been flaunted before the House as a matador flaunts a red flag before a mad bull, and with the same effect. So that the primary and real question of the total number has received scant and hurried attention.

CORONER'S INQUEST ON THE "NEW METHOD."

I have no desire to protract the funeral services over the Seaton method, and shall only say that the unlamented deceased fractured his skull in an attempt to butt down an adamantine wall of arithmetic as old as the first division of anything into equal shares, namely, the rule that the same divisor shall be applied to each of the numbers. It proposed that when by the use of one divisor you reached the "remainders," this divisor should be laid aside and fifteen or twenty new ones employed. Naturally the Seaton method soon became the very-much-sat-on method.

Then came the sausage-machine method. It proposed to chop up the populations of the several States into pieces of as nearly the same size as was practicable, and to take these pieces in "the order of their magnitude," making a sort of mathematical bologna sausage, and labeling it "apportionment." Of course, the larger the population of a State the better its rank, and by this arrangement Illinois, Pennsylvania, and New York each obtained one more Representative than either was entitled to. The characteristic of this method was that in place of one common divisor you used thirty-eight different divisors, a new one for each State. Like Columbus and Adam, it also is dead. It ought to be!

Suppose that a trustee should attempt to divide, say, three hundred and twenty-five shares of a bonanza mine among thirty-eight directors, owning, in the proportions of the populations of the States, $49,371,340 of stock; that he used a common divisor of 151,906 until he had three hundred and nine shares, with remainders amounting to $2,430,641; that instead of distributing these millions as decimals, by the same divisor, he took sixteen other divisors, or by the sausage-machine method, thirty-eight different divisors from the start; then suppose he was arraigned in court on a charge of fraud, what would be the verdict? There is only one State in the Union where any other verdict than that of guilty would be rendered. I know a State filled with sun-browned faces and sturdy souls which has a good deal of resolute justice scattered around loose, and in it the court might not be troubled with this trustee, but he would settle that $2,430,641 in the good old way all the same.

Since the world began there has been but one way of proportioning numbers, namely, by using a common divisor, by running the "remainders" into decimals, by taking in the fractions above .5, and dropping those below .5; nor can there ever be any other method. This process is purely arithmetical. No possible considerations can enter it except the fixed relations of numbers. If a hundred men were being torn limb from limb, or a thousand babes were being crushed, this process would have no more feeling in the matter than would an iceberg; because the science of mathematics has no more bowels of mercy than has a cast-iron dog.

And that is all I now have to say about methods, though I had what, considering its authorship, struck me as a rather able-bodied speech on that question.

THE CHOICE OF A TOTAL NUMBER A QUESTION OF STATESMANSHIP.

But, Mr. Speaker, the question as to what the final number shall be, whether 325, 319, 275, or otherwise, is not a mathematical question. Arithmetic, with its fixed guides and driving-rods, has nothing under the sun to do with it. In selecting this number the services of your Gradgrinds and Babbitt machines and lightning-calculators can be dispensed with. After a choice has been made let them go to work; but in making that choice they have no place.

Because this is an act of volition; an act of the keenest intellect swayed and surged by the warmest considerations that a fervid soul can press. It is an act of the highest manhood prompted by a throbbing heart. Your cast-iron dog is incapable of performing it. This choice of a total number is a question of statesmanship and not at all of machinery; a question of the trend of national migration; of the march of populations; sometimes of the growths of cities, but more generally of the exodus of workingmen and women from full streets, crowded factories, or overthronged vocations out to the open prairies, the cool forests, or the blue mountain's side.

If you should analyze the forces which cause and impel the nation's shiftings you would find among them every factor of both the broadest and the narrowest statesmanship with which any Congress concerns itself. You would find the factors of labor and wages, of crops and freights, of health and disease, of tariff and taxes, of corporations, of equal laws, of schools, of churches, of godlike charity, of eternal liberty; and surely these be the very marrow of the wisest statecraft.

As the great tide of American migration each year swells higher and broader upon the continent, it sweeps through valleys, over plains, and around ranges in a way wholly unanticipated. It stops where you supposed it would move on, and rushes past regions where you supposed it would stop. Leaving the Eastern homestead, though festooned with the memories of generations, it pours into the black shafts after ore and coal; leaving the whir of spindles, it levels forests and opens furrows; leaving the newer States, it sweeps hither and yon over the Rockies into the farthest northwest, and as well to the Rio Grande and Gila. But, wherever it goes, it carries with it the constitutional right of representation in this body; and wherever it stops, just then and there stops the eternal basis of a just apportionment. So that the real question before this House, viz, the selection of that number of Representatives which will best proportion the vote of the American poople, is a question of foresight as well as of census, of broad nationality, of the highest school of communal philosophy, of the truest and best statesmanship, and is just everything else in the world than a mere problem of bowelless arithmetic and machine mathematics.

That is the question for this House to settle, and it is as different from the modulus nonsense and the sausage-machine as is the Sermon on the Mount from a last year's bird's-nest.

NOT A QUESTION OF ARITHMETIC.

Why, sir, the other day, after the demolishing speech of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] who by the true rule showed the representative power rightfully belonging to each State on a basis of 321 members, I said to him, "Why don't you give an additional Representative to Kansas? You take in Wisconsin at .55 and rule out Kansas at .47." "Oh," was the reply, "Kansas is below .50 and is not entitled to another member." Mathematically my friend was correct; correct to the exact degree of .03, or, on his ratio of 153,805, just 4,614 persons! Think of it, please! In 1870 Kansas had 365,000 people; in 1880 by the census it had 1,000,000 less 4,044—an increase, mark you, of 200 per cent., or 20 per cent. a year. To-day it has over 100,000 more, say about the population of New Jersey. Yet, forsooth, because at 321 and by the census it lacked 4,614 persons of a moiety, therefore it was not entitled to an additional Representative.

And yet my friend was right, exactly right on his basis. But the trouble was that he, like so many of us, was lugging in as a necessarily incorrect answer to the higher question of statesmanship that which was a correct answer to the lower one of proportioning 321. The true question was not why he ruled out Kansas at 321, but why he did not go to 322 and take Kansas in. And that is precisely the point which, over the shoulders of the eloquent gentleman from Michigan, I am proposing to this House.

Every one knows that proportions will vary just as your divisor varies. Thus in a body of 325 the quotas of all the States would change at least as to the decimals, of which fact the following illustrations will suffice:

Ratio at 321, 153,805; ratio at 325, 151,906.

	321.	325.
Iowa	10.56=11	10.69=11
Wisconsin	8.55= 9	8.66= 9
Kansas	6.47= 6	6.55= 7
Texas	10.34=10	10.68=11
New York	33.04=33	33.47=34

The principle of proportion which is correct at 321 is precisely as correct at 325. The resulting difference is not in the mathematical process but solely in the numbers chosen. Now, how much does that difference amount to practically? Take a House of 321. There are irreverent persons, persons without the fear of God before their eyes, who actually and publicly designate this House as a "bear-garden!" Just how much difference, now, would four more bears make in a garden of 321, especially such mild-mannered bruins as would come from Kansas, South Carolina, Texas, and New York? If this Hall will accommodate 321, cannot room be found for 325, especially if a limitation is made as to girth, say of six feet?

DELEGATIONS IN A HOUSE OF 275.

But if not, let us take a smaller total, and for one I am willing to drop 50 numbers below 325. Many gentlemen loudly deplore a large House, and strenuously insist upon the notion that the smaller the body the greater the efficiency—a notion by the way mashed into smithereens by the Senate every day. I challenge these gentlemen to settle on 275, or a body less than the present one by 18 members, and in which all of the States would lose a proportionate share of the 18.

In spite of this loss the following twelve States would hold their existing delegations: Arkansas, Colorado, Delaware, Georgia, Iowa, Michigan, Mississippi, Nevada, North Carolina, Oregon, Rhode Island, West Virginia.

Twenty States would lose, as follows: Alabama, 1; Connecticut, 1; Florida, 1; Illinois, 2; Indiana, 2; Kentucky, 1; Louisiana, 1; Maine, 1; Maryland, 1; Massachusetts, 1; Missouri, 1; New Hampshire, 1; New York, 5; Ohio, 2; Pennsylvania, 3; Tennessee, 1; Vermont, 1; Virginia, 1; Wisconsin, 1.

Six States gain: California, 1; Kansas, 3; Minnesota, 1; Nebraska, 2; South Carolina, 1; Texas, 3.

And just there you find the true reason why this House will not take 275. The twenty States which would be reduced in representation have sufficient votes to kill that proposition. On this basis the vote of Illinois in the electoral college then would be 17 instead of 19; of Indiana, 11 in place of 13; of Ohio, 18 in lieu of 20; New York would fall from 33 to 28, and Pennsylvania from 27 to 24. By the same token California would rise from 4 to 5, Kansas from 3 to 6, Minnesota from 3 to 4, Nebraska from 1 to 3, South Carolina from 5 to 6, and Texas from 6 to 9.

These figures blow away as with a blast the objections which some gentlemen allege, by revealing the true reason in the shape of the effect which 275 would have on their delegations and districts. And these figures also reveal, as by a flash of lightning, a broader and nobler fact, namely, the sweep of the tide of American migration; the ebb and flow of the very basis of representation and apportionment. Gentlemen will do well to take cognizance of the level of this vast stream, for it overlaps State lines in its spread, and before it historic wealths crumble as the bank before the freshet.

SHIFT OF POPULATION SINCE 1870.

To show its change in the last ten years take a House of 293, the size of this one. The following States would lose 1 each: Alabama, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Hampshire, Ohio, Tennessee, Vermont; Pennsylvania would lose 2 and New York 3. The following would gain 1 each: Arkansas, California, Iowa, Michigan, South Carolina, West Virginia; Minnesota and Nebraska 2 each, Kansas and Texas 3 each.

In other words, you find that in the shift of population since 1870 only 13 States have held their own; that 13 other States have each lost 1 member, while Pennsylvania has lost 2 and New York 3; that Arkansas, California, Iowa, Michigan, South Carolina, and West Virginia have each gained 1, Minnesota and Nebraska 2, and Kansas and Texas 3 each. Or, to put it another way, the ratio being 168,497, Pennsylvania has fallen behind 336,994 and New York 505,491, while the single States of Kansas and Nebraska have gained these five groups, or 842,485 people. Texas and Minnesota have gained the loss by Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Massachusetts, and Vermont.

And just here you have gotten at the true inwardness of the struggle over the total number. It is the older States and not the newer which are responsible for the increased size of the House. Those of them which are losing will not consent to a reduced delegation. It is the struggle of a proper patriotism, but nevertheless a struggle against manifest destiny. As well might men seek to hold down the tide of the Atlantic to low-water mark as seek to prevent the swell of our national growth. The grandest of eastern products—a sturdy manhood and superb womanhood—are floating westward. The magnificent growths of Pennsylvania with its forges and of New York with its trains and steamers have been relatively surpassed by those of Texas and Kansas. And these are facts which sooner or later the historic States, though bright in the affections of every American as the flashing jewels in the colonial crown, must nevertheless recognize. Some day the time will have arrived when a Congress, seeing such facts floated up by the mighty tide of migration, will fathom its depths, will plat its breadth, and, best of all, will, when apportioning fractions, forecast its probable trend.

SUGGESTIONS TO THE REPUBLICANS.

Nor can even the Republican party afford to ignore such facts to-day. The shift of population inevitably carries with it a shift of representation. Neither it nor any other party can afford to go before the American people with some juggle for the benefit of certain States, and then with its finger in its mouth inform an inquiring public that it "didn't know the apportionment gun was loaded."

Much as some gentlemen may dislike to spare the time, a fair discussion, a free vote, and a just settlement of this highest of all questions is infinitely more important to the party, to the House, and to the country than is the comfort of certain Legislatures which we have so often been told "want to go home." Bless them, let them go home and stay there! Better this than any ignoring of the right to a just representation in this Government of any group of Americans, no matter where they live, or any suppression of free speaking and free voting on amendments.

And while I am at it I wish to say a few more things confidentially and in the sacred privacy of these proceedings to my party friends, and especially to the supporters of 320 and 321. The last Congress chose 319; that is, the countless and clashing interests counterpoised at that total. Perhaps the controlling force was the general opinion that the relative position of the great parties at 293 was maintained at 319. It is wonderful how little reference has been made thus far to the influence of politics in the choice of a number. One might suppose that there were no politicians on this floor; but he would be a fool if he did. Starting at 319 as a number at which the parties are balanced, at 320 Iowa comes in and is a Republican gain in the electoral college; and the same is true of Wisconsin at 321. There is only one better Republican total, and that is Kansas, at 322.

Will our Democratic friends over there consent to these party gains? I sincerely wish they might. It would be exceedingly gratifying to us, and likewise would be an evidence of—well, say Divine grace.

But do you believe they will do it? I have a misty recollection that when last year the Democrats tried to take what we deemed to be a similar party advantage several of us helped them with vigor and tenacity not to do it; and they did not do it! I will not say that anybody filibustered, but there were at least several times when I, with a deal of vim, did not vote. And as I look over the way I can see several esteemed gentlemen who are not a bit better in this respect than we were. And I have not the slightest confidence in their political stupidity. If you try to stop at 321 or 320 they will force you to 319 or below, and that will leave Wisconsin and Iowa with large unrepresented fractions. If that is what those States want and is what the neighboring State of Michigan wants, all right; they will be mighty certain to get it. You will either have to take 319 or less, just because in a House as close as this one neither party will be allowed to make a party gain in the electoral college.

It is quite as much to your interest, then, as it is to the interest of Kansas that you support the amendment of 325. It balances Iowa, Wisconsin, and Kansas with the Democratic States of South Carolina at 323, Texas at 324, and New York at 325. Politically, 293, 319, and 325 are the same. And I submit that the States of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Kansas have some claims upon the good-will and comradeship of the Republicans on this floor, and, further and better, that their geographical relation to the tide of migration, both present and prospective, gives them a just claim upon the judgments of all men who view this question from the higher level of nationality and future equities.

SUGGESTIONS TO THE DEMOCRATS.

To the other side I tender 325 as being politically fair—not so good for you as some total that you could select, and which you probably cannot get, but fair as a compromise number. South Carolina balances Iowa, Texas balances Wisconsin, and New York with its Democratic Legislature balances Kansas.

In olden times Virginia was proud of Kentucky, and in later days Kentucky had a warm side for Tennessee. Why? Because the younger sons of Virginia moved to Kentucky, and the younger sons of Kentucky to Tennessee. Does not that principle hold good of Texas to-day as related to the older States of the South. And though either 319 or 325 may make no difference in the delegation of your State, yet is not your former neighbor, who has moved to Texas or Kansas, where many Kentuckians and Tennesseeans and Missourians are living, entitled to the same ratio of representation in his new home that he had in his old home? In these days railroads have wiped out intervening distances, and your old friends, though beyond your State line, have not gotten beyond the glow of your memory or the sound of a hearty hail for a helping hand. And in their behalf I commend their plea to men of the South and men of the North; the plea of Texas on the one side, of Kansas on the other, in the same attitude, with similar equities, with equally bright futures, the one speaking all along the line through countless Southern homes in all the Southern States back to Virginia, Maryland, and Delaware; the other, speaking through the meshed relationships that network Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, across New England and far back to the royal pines and hearts of Maine.

And what is true of Kansas is as true of Wisconsin and Iowa. You can do those States an injustice that will fetter them for ten long years by cutting them off at 319. You can, at 325, by dealing generously with them, by forecasting the future sweep of the great tide that never again will stop and never grow less, be governed in the settlement of this question by the highest considerations which may influence the wisest statesmen intrusted with the affairs of a mighty nation. The choice of the final number is wholly and solely an arbitrary act. You can take any one you please. In choosing should not the future be considered? If you make no provision for additional representation in the growing States before 1893, should not the probable drift of population between now and then be considered and an allowance made accordingly?

INTERMEDIATE ENUMERATION.

One of my colleagues [Mr. HASKELL] represents in this body a quarter of a million of people; my other colleague [Mr. RYAN] over a third of a million; and I think that the population of the first district of Kansas is at this hour nearer half a million than 400,000. A group of 150,000 persons in Kansas or Texas is just as much entitled to a Representative as in any other State; and I have submitted another amendment to correct the evil which exists in every new State. It provides for an intermediate enumeration by the United States, but paid for by the State, and the assignment of an additional member for each additional group. If it be constitutional to admit a new member when you admit a new State, then it is equally constitutional to admit a Representative for an additional group in an existing State. Whether the House will adopt this amendment remains to be seen; but if not, then certainly the growing States should be treated generously and their future development be recognized by the number chosen. Regarded in whatever light one pleases, that of 325 is fair politically, just to all the States, and comes nearer meeting the demands of future equities than any other.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to detain the House with any remarks I may have to offer upon this bill, nor do I seek the floor now for any such purpose. I believe the bill has been sufficiently discussed in the House to demonstrate the fact that it will be voted down by a very large majority; and perhaps I should not have anything whatever to say were it not for the fact that I feel compelled to make my acknowledgments to members on both sides of the House, to Representatives from all sections of the country, for the very impartial and fair manner in which the bill has been discussed so far as it relates to my own State. That discussion has demonstrated the fact, Mr. Speaker, that there are members of this House who believe in fair play, and who cannot be induced to accept a bill the tendency of which would be to deprive three of the States of this Union of their representative power on this floor; or to deprive them of the rights that they are entitled to under the Constitution and laws of the land.

It has demonstrated the fact that the three great States, New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois, which would aggregate eighty-odd votes in this House were they consolidated, being nearly one-third of the entire number of Representatives, that they could not convince themselves that it was justice to the States of California, Florida, and Rhode Island, nor could they obtain sufficient power in this House to pass the bill which has been presented by this committee. I therefore say to the members of this House on both sides, Democrats and Republicans, that as a Representative from one of the States that would have been injured by the passage of this bill, I feel called upon in behalf of my constituents to return my earnest thanks for the generous manner in which they have come forward and defended the rights of the people of California as well as of these other two States which this bill sought to injure.

I do not believe, sir, nor do I wish to be understood as saying that the committee in their labors have intended any injustice to those States. But it has been clearly demonstrated, Mr. Speaker, that if this bill should pass it would be an act of injustice for which this House would be compelled, or its members would be compelled to apologize before the American people.

I do not desire, sir, as I have already said, to detain the House further with any remarks I may have to make in this connection. I repeat that I think the bill has been fully discussed. I should have been glad, however, had I the time, and did I not believe that the House is already weary of this subject, to have replied to some remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE,] as well as to remarks made by other gentlemen in this connection, who I believe do not understand the gross outrage that would be perpetrated on some of the States of the Union by the passage of this bill.

I trust, however, and believe, that I can safely take my seat with full confidence and knowledge that this bill will be overwhelmingly beaten; and that the House will agree to some consistent number—325, 321, or 319—that will in my judgment do justice not only to my State, but to all of the other States of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Kentucky does not seem to be in his place.

Mr. TALBOTT. He will be here in a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Kentucky is not here the next hour, I believe, under the arrangement, would come to me, and I desire to hand it over to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. TILLMAN,] who was kind enough to give me his hour in the first instance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Indiana desires to yield the floor for a few moments to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. PIERCE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Speaker, I would not have entered into the debate on this question at this late hour had not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] endeavored to electrify the corpse which I supposed my friend, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. JOYCE,] had so decently laid out and interred. It comes with peculiarly bad grace, it seems to me, from the gentleman from Pennsylvania to press the method by which Pennsylvania particularly profits at the expense of the smaller States—among which Rhode Island is a startling example—Pennsylvania, forsooth, claiming, under this "new method," for its fraction of 117,196 people 2 Representatives, and denying to Rhode Island for its larger fraction of 122,246 any representation.

That matter has been so fully discussed and so much enlarged upon by gentlemen who have preceded me, who have explained the reason and the cause why this "new method," as it is called, should not be adopted, that I shall not detain the House by going over any part of those figures or any part of that discussion again. I have, however—as my friend, the gentleman from California, has done—thought it to be my duty to return thanks to our friends who have come to the rescue and prevented the injustice which was attempted to be done under this new method of apportionment. We of New England, and we of Rhode Island, are not disposed, I believe, to be sentimental concerning these matters. I do not urge that anything should be given to the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor except what she is fairly entitled to; and I ask no representation for her under any bill which may be passed here except such as she may be fairly and reasonably entitled to in justice to the people, under a fair, impartial, and constitutional method of apportionment. We recognize that the power of population has drifted away from our section of the country. We recognize the fact that the great West and Northwest, to the building up of which New England has contributed so large a part, has reduced our proportionate representation in this House, and necessarily so.

But we do protest against any plan or any project which would give to Pennsylvania, to New York, to Illinois, or to any other State representation for no population and refuse to Rhode Island representation for a population amounting in this case to 122,246 people. And when I have stated this I have but reiterated, as I know, what has already been urged upon this floor.

One word more and I have done. I do suggest to the House that this method of representation not only works this injustice as against the three States of California, Florida, and Rhode Island, but I insist that it also, in the inequality of representation which it gives to the great States of New York, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, does disproportionately increase the power of those States in this House and necessarily their power and weight in the electoral college. And therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that this method of apportionment has something that concerns not alone these six States, but concerns every State in this Union. If it did not I should say to gentlemen here representing those other States, even if this does not affect your interests will you strike down one-half of the representation of the little State of Rhode Island, which benefits you not and leaves us poor indeed?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL was recognized, and said: The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. TILLMAN,] a member of the committee, was kind enough to give me an hour with the understanding that when I was reached I should return it. I now, in fulfillment of that promise, hand over to him the hour to which I am entitled.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, there are three practical issues involved in this bill. The first is as to the number of the House; the second as to the mode by which Representatives for fractions shall be assigned to the respective States; the third as to whether a county or election district of a State that chooses a member in the popular branch of the Legislature shall be divided in erecting an election district for a Representative in Congress.

I shall say but little except as to the size of the House. So far as the new method of apportionment, as it is called, is concerned, I shall be very brief. That bantling has been so terribly belabored that I am satisfied the author of it, and the champions of it on this floor, have long since become sick of it. I will simply remark, however, that, so far as it is concerned, it does not even have the freshness of novelty to recommend it. It is as old as the first apportionment bill that was ever discussed in this House. It was even then proposed, and was voted down.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] pointed out the other day where it was overwhelmingly defeated when the apportionment bill of 1832 was under consideration. Again, in 1822, the method was proposed in the form of an amendment to the apportionment bill under the fourth census, and actually in better language and in clearer terms than have been employed by any speakers, or even the revivor of it in his report to this House. It was defeated then by a majority of over two to one. Mr. Condict, of New Jersey, was the man who proposed it. As respects the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] to guard against gerrymandering in any of the States, and particularly in his own, I, when the bill and amendments shall come up for consideration, propose to offer a substitute for the gentleman's amendment which will be to the effect that in erecting an election district for a Representative in Congress no election district for the choice of a member in the most popular branch of the State Legislature shall be divided. I think that a provision of this kind will prove an ample remedy for the abuse which the gentleman complains of.

I come now to the third and main point which I shall discuss.

I am in favor of the largest House that can be had this side of a mob.

A majority of the Committee on the Census have reported a bill for a House of 320 Representatives, while individual members of the committee have introduced amendments proposing a larger or smaller number. I advocate the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont, which proposes a House of 365 members, but I do it only as a sort of compromise, because I would cheerfully vote for 600 Representatives on this floor if any one would propose it.

Theoretically we live in a republic which has been well defined to be a government whose officers are elected at short intervals, if not by a majority of the people, at least by a considerable number of them. This is in contradistinction to the despotism of the one-man power or the aristocracy of the few. In other words, it has long been the proud boast of the Fourth of July orators that this is "a government of the people, by the people, for the people." I admit that it was once true, both theoretically and practically, but I deny that it is true now or that it has been true for long, either in respect to our Federal Government or to many of our State governments, and chiefly because representation in Congress and in the State Legislatures has not kept pace with increase of population and wealth.

Law is the only supreme ruler in a republic. While the law governs every man with an iron rod, he is supposed to help make it. As it is not only physically impossible for the whole people to assemble at their capitol to pass laws, but would be unwise if it were possible, as law is but the compromising consent of the governed, so that consent should never be enacted into law until it has been extracted through a full and fair representation of the people.

Sages and philosophers in all ages have agreed that the strongest passion in man is love of power over his fellows. What is so agreeable to our self-love as to be able to force others to do our bidding, either in submitting to experiment in government or to being deprived of property or robbed of labor, especially when either can be accomplished according to the forms of law? But the love of power for power's own sake is so great that men generally would rather cheat or rob another of liberty than property. It is for this reason that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. Men strive just as hard to take undue advantage of each other in making the laws of a republic as in the transaction of any private business, and as the law of the land is the great arbiter of the happiness or misery of the masses in a popular government, every precaution should be taken to prevent public authority from being perverted to private ends. It is much easier for a small body of legislators to subordinate their law-making power to private uses than for a large body, and for the reason that a few men can combine to do a bad or good action much more readily than a larger number, and because a small body can be bribed or intimidated with far more facility than a large one.

To prevent such perversion of power and to nationalize our population, as well as to socialize the different States of our Union, I contend that we now have and have long had too little representation in either branch of Congress to fairly express public opinion on great questions. Legislation on trivial matters or upon mere routine business may very well be left to a small House and still smaller Senate, but on grand issues I do not believe the people of the United States have been adequately represented in either House of Congress for the last forty years.

Nearly every valuable feature in our Constitution and laws has been derived from England, and even now, whenever we want an example to imitate we generally go to the mother country for it. Let us compare the present representation of the English people in their Parliament with the representation of the American people in their Congress. There are now 538 voting members in the English Senate, or House of Lords, whereas the American people have but 78 members in their Senate. So, too, the British House of Commons has not had less than 650 members at any time during the present century, but the Americans have only 293 Representatives in their lower house.

Yet Great Britain and Ireland have a territory of only about one hundred and twenty one thousand square miles, while the organized States of the American Union have an area of over 2,090,000 square miles. Then again the United Kingdom of England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland had a population, by the census taken in 1881, of only about thirty-five millions, while our population the same year amounted to over fifty millions. So that, omitting fractions, while every 63,000 inhabitants of the United Kingdom have a vote in the House of Lords and every 53,000 a vote in the House of Commons, only about every half million of our people on the average have a vote in the American Senate and only about every one hundred and seventy thousand a vote in the House. If we look at the representation of the people in the Parliaments of other great nations on the continent of Europe, where constitutional governments prevail, the contrast is equally striking. I will collate a list of some of the most prominent legislative bodies in Europe, with their numbers:

Countries.	Upper House.	Lower House.
France	300	532
Prussia	302	434
Austria	191	353
Hungary	731	444
Italy	270	508

Neither of these countries except France has much over half the population of the United States. If it be said that most of these nations have not been in possession of a constitutional representative government long enough to furnish an example worthy of imitation, I am ready to concede it, but it certainly is a very significant fact that the people now have more representation in their law making assemblies in nearly every nation in Europe, than in the United States.

Besides England, there are three other nations on the continent that enjoy and have long enjoyed constitutional representative governments most of the time for several centuries. These are Switzerland, Belgium and Holland, (the Netherlands.) At this time, every 45,000 inhabitants of Holland have a representative in the national legislature; about every forty-three thousand people of Belgium also have a representative in Parliament, while in Switzerland there is a representative for every 20,000 of the population.

When we reflect on the large representation of the people in each of these three free States, and when we also remember that about every fifty-three thousand Englishmen have an organ and a vote in Parliament, while only every 170,000 Americans have a Representative in Congress, ought it to surprise any one that we should frequently hear the remark in conversation, or read it in the newspapers, that government in Europe is becoming more democratic every day, while in America it is tending more to the aristocratic or one-man power?

Power is ever seeking its own increase, and political power especially has a constant tendency to steal from the many to the few, to guard against which our English ancestors, who have been slowly but steadily improving in their government for the last five hundred years, have during all that time been in favor of a large House of Commons. Since the days of the Stuarts England and Wales alone have had about 500 members in the Commons. At the union with Scotland nearly two hundred years ago 45 other representatives were added for that country, and at the union with Ireland at the beginning of the present century still another 100 were added for her quota; since which time the Commons has never had less than 650 members, although several acts reforming Parliament as to suffrage and constituencies have been passed. Thus while representation in the Commons of Great Britain has never been less than one member for every 53,000 inhabitants, which is the ratio to-day, the people of the United States have not had as much representation as that in their National Legislature since forty years ago. Each member on this floor now represents over three times as many inhabitants as a member of the House of Commons.

Hence England may be said from the very start to have established a maximum representation of her people to protect them against the encroachments of wealth, the designs of demagogues, or the assaults of ambition, while the United States, on the other hand, may be said to have commenced with a minimum of representation and to have adhered to it, at least since 1832. No matter how many reform bills Parliament may adopt, the House of Commons nearly always remains the same, fluctuating around the figures 650, with a slight tendency to gradual increase through the extension of suffrage and the formation of new classes of constituencies, such as universities.

The United States, on the other hand, commenced with a minimum of 105 Representatives in 1790, when the population was less than 4,000,000, and have increased the membership of the House so grudgingly that ninety years later we only have 293 members, when the population is over 50,000,000. It is also a remarkable and even an anomalous fact in the history of representative government that during forty years, between 1830 and 1870, representation in this body was not increased at all; and for twenty years, between 1840 and 1860, was actually reduced from 243 members in 1830 to 223 members in 1840, and to 234 members in 1850, and increased to only 243 members in 1860, although during this forty years of no increase in representation our population and wealth nearly trebled. The people had likewise become scattered over half the continent, and of course needed more Representatives and smaller election districts, to have proper acquaintanceship and sympathy between the law-maker and his constituents. To verify these facts, to which I shall allude again, we have only to refer to the aggregate population and ratio of representation at each census and thereby get the number of Representatives allowed during each decade:

Census.	Year.	Population.	Ratio.	Representatives.
First	1790	3,929,214	33,000	105
Second	1800	5,294,390	33,000	141
Third	1810	7,215,858	35,000	181
Fourth	1820	9,600,783	40,000	213
Fifth	1830	12,820,868	47,700	240
Sixth	1840	17,019,641	70,680	223
Seventh	1850	23,067,262	93,423	234
Eighth	1860	31,183,744	127,381	243
Ninth	1870	38,115,641	131,425	293

There is much food for thought in these figures, and it may be remarked that the very worst legislation which has occurred in our history took place during the forty years between 1830 and 1870, when we had the least representation in proportion to numbers and wealth. Especially was it during the last decade of this period of least representation that most of the bad legislation occurred. It was in those ten years that the Southern Senators and Representatives were absent from their post—five years from choice, and another five by compulsory exclusion. Nearly half the Senate, which is very small, (much too small,) even when all the States are represented, and more than a third of the House were absent when the revolutionary reconstruction measures were adopted by abolishing the State governments at the South and amending the Constitution with the bayonet, so as to debase suffrage by enfranchising a horde of ignorant venal negro voters. It was likewise during that decade of smallest representation of the people in Congress that nearly 200,000,000 acres of public land was donated to railroads, that the Pacific mail subsidy was granted, the Sanborn fraud perpetrated, the public debt increased from depreciated greenbacks to coin, then from coin to gold by demonetizing silver, and that many other acts of infamous legislation, too numerous to mention, were passed by Congress.

Certainly the advocates of small representation of the people in either house of Congress can find but little comfort in reflecting on the honesty and fidelity to public trust displayed by the small House and still smaller Senate between the years 1863 and 1872. What aggravated the matter was that the handful of patriotic and faithful Senators and Representatives from the North were borne down during the latter portion of the decade by bogus Senators and Representatives from the South, which was doubtless reconstructed in the manner she was for the very purpose of better enabling corrupt lawgivers to pervert the powers of government to private uses.

It is the great inequality of pecuniary conditions that does most to destroy liberty in a republic. A wealthy man is unhappy unless he can indulge the vanity of displaying his wealth. He not only wants the world to know it, but to feel it; and as a rule, he uses his best endeavors to make his fellow-men feel it. Hence, he seeks for exclusive privileges and for titles; to obtain which money can serve his purposes better than any thing else, especially after great and long abuses in legislation have enabled the wealthy classes to combine against the poor, and change the form of government.

> The strongest castle, tower, and town,
> The golden bullet beats it down.

There are two methods of overthrowing genuine republican liberty and they are equally effective. The one by duping the ignorant and bribing the venal voter to elect unworthy men to office, who will betray their trust, and the other by corrupting the people's Representatives after they have been elected through giving them too much power and subjecting them to too much temptation in a small body of law-makers. Both of these methods were employed to a fearful extent in this country during Grant's administrations. One million of illiterate or purchasable negro voters were enfranchised, which enabled either a wealthy man to bribe, or an ambitious demagogue to delude, such voters into clothing him with public power that he might use it for base private purposes; in short, to pass laws for making the few richer and the many poorer. When bribery or demagoguery failed to elect such accommodating Senators and Representatives at the South during the decade in question the sword decided the result. Of course such pretended Senators and Representatives were really no true agents of the people, but only represented themselves and were for sale. The Vanderbilts, the Goulds, and the thousand other millionaires of this country, nearly all of whom became such during the decade to which I have referred, are living witnesses of how a small body of legislators, with an honest minority made still smaller by a wholesale debasing of the suffrage, can be degraded into enacting laws for robbing the public to enrich a few, including the legislators themselves.

Just as nothing protects civil liberty so much as an equal division of political power primarily among worthy voters, so nothing tends to preserve that liberty more than intrusting the law-making power to as many hands as practicable. This is the theory of our English ancestors, from whom we have copied all our best institutions. I cannot help thinking that if we had adopted a maximum House of Representatives of about 600 members, a Senate of about 300, as a part of our Constitution at the foundation of the Government, we would have been much better off to-day and our future less gloomy.

Not only have the English people for several hundred years had a House of Commons as large as possible to keep short of a mob, but the tendency has been to enlarge the membership of the House of Lords also. During Queen Victoria's reign of forty years more than one-third of the 538 voting peers have been created, with decided advantage. The dignity and authority of the upper house, as well as the confidence of the people in its integrity, ability, and patriotism, have all been promoted by this late addition of peers.

The great Lord Treasurer Burleigh used to say that "England could never be ruined but by a Parliament," because, as the sole law-making power, if it should become corrupt, the people would be without any "manner of remedy." The liberty of every free people has perished by the legislative power becoming more corrupt than the executive, just as our liberties will perish unless we shall erect a Gibraltar in a large House of Representatives to successfully resist the attacks of the Executive and the encroachments of colossal monopolies.

It is cause for congratulation that at no period of our history has the National Legislature been more corrupt than the Executive except during Grant's presidency, and it is cause for still greater felicitation that as soon as our indignant people discovered the reeking rottenness of Congress in 1874 they hurled the party that had produced it from power, but only temporarily. That party has again recovered much of its lost strength, partly through the operation of the bad laws it has so long had on the statute-book to benefit the few at the expense of the many, and partly by means of the corrupt use of the vast individual and corporate wealth which its partial legislation has accumulated in the hands of a few monopolists. During and since the war the revolutions in property among our people have created a prodigious inequality of circumstances. The natural tendency to this evil, which, as I said before, exists in every free government, is much intensified here, because we have a large, fertile, and virgin territory to afford full scope for agriculture. We also have an abundance of cheap food and raw material for manufactures, and we have the richest mines in the world which on the immense public domain are given away to anybody who will work them. But these natural facilities for a bold and enterprising man to accumulate an immense estate have been, as I have already remarked, still further increased during the last twenty years by a too small House of Representatives, yielding both to temptation and the dictation of the lobby, so as to rob the public of hundreds of millions, ay, thousands of millions of dollars and divert it into private pockets. The land grants and other subsidies, the tariff and internal revenue laws, the financial legislation in regard to the national debt and national banks, all prove this.

Many of the mammoth private fortunes thus acquired have been used to buy up and consolidate into a few hands most of the hundred thousand miles of railroad in this country, so that a very small number of men can for the most part control all the railway transportation of the continent and thereby levy an unjust tribute upon trade. If the strong arm of a stronger House of Representatives than we now possess be not stretched forth shortly to prevent the extortion of consolidated railroads, it is very questionable whether Congress shall ever be able to relieve interstate commerce of its present intolerable burdens. Moreover, the banking, manufacturing, and other wealthy monopolies of this country, made such chiefly by the partial legislation of too little representation in Congress, can ultimately be prevented from creating titles and coats of arms and establishing privileged political classes only by a larger infusion of popular blood in the House. Wealth and power just as naturally go together as the sexes. As nearly all our enormously wealthy men who crave superior rank and exclusive power reside in the cities, where also may be found most of the voters who can be controlled by the money-power, it is obvious that the best safeguards for republican liberty here are, first, to have as large a representative body of law-makers as possible this side of a mob, and, second, to elect a majority of those law-makers from small election districts in the country, by intelligent, frugal, virtuous, independent agriculturists, who care nothing for the wealth or influence of city millionaires, and who act "unawed by power and unbribed by gain." Tweedism, or Bossism, as it is appropriately called in New York, Philadelphia, and elsewhere, has its habitat in the city. It cannot flourish in the country.

God made the country; man made the town; and as natural things generally are superior to artificial ones, so the country is a much better nursery of the sturdy virtues that preserve freedom than a city can possibly be. Masses of people in the latter are prone to think, feel, and act as one man, and hence are often the easy victims of knaves, fools, or demagogues; but not so in the country, where men are too much scattered to be easily led or misled, and where every little village or neighborhood is a separate center of thought and action which asserts its own individuality. The large House of Commons and the great number of separate, small rural constituencies are evidently the strongholds of the British constitution for keeping the legislature less corrupt than the executive and for according liberty and equality before the law to every citizen.

This House should be increased to enable it to protect itself against executive patronage. The intention of the framers of the Constitution was to make this body the strongest and most popular branch of the Government, but in practice it is the weakest. This results partly from the authority which the Senate has every ten years to check the increase of the House under a new census, and partly from the small and weak Senate having long since abdicated its constitutional right to exercise a negative on removals from office by the President. In fact it has never asserted that authority at all, although clothed with it in broad and unequivocal terms by the Constitution. The plain language of the instrument, Elliott's Debates, the seventy-seventh number of the Federalist, and all the contemporary history and authorities, concur in this. But the little feeble Senate yielded the power to the Father of his Country without a murmur for fear that if they did not he would not appoint their friends to office.

The Federal judiciary is absorbing new powers every day, and can protect itself even in these usurpations by its life tenure and by its subserviency to the Executive, which in turn can protect both itself and the accommodating judiciary by the power of appointment to a hundred thousand offices with the consent of the Senate to-day, and by the unlimited power of removal from those offices to-morrow without the consent of the Senate. What a mockery!

Yet while the Senate can in some measure defend itself against executive encroachments by withholding its consent to appointments, still by renouncing its constitutional negative on removals from office it has abdicated its most important function and thereby exposed the House to the unlimited patronage of the Executive and turned the country over to the dangers of partisanship and spoils. A large House can offer much more resistance to the domination of executive patronage than a small one, especially at a time like this when both Senators and Representatives dance attendance on the Executive, hat in hand, day by day, begging office.

This House should likewise be very large to better meet the probable contingency of having to elect the President. Think of it, if such a thing were to occur now, a single Representative from each of four States would cast the votes of those States, and that a very few Representatives would throw the votes of several other States. Every dictate of reason, authority, and experience declares that the body of Representatives for 50,000,000 of people, scattered over a continent and having divers climates, interests, and pursuits, ought to be a large epitome of the masses it represents—in fact a little mass-meeting of Representatives instead of a big mass-meeting of the people. The essence of civil liberty is self-government and the central idea of self-government is local government. Hence where a man is governed by strangers instead of by himself and his neighbors cooperating, it is tyranny, not liberty, because it is foreign, not home rule. Therefore it would not do to have but one election district of the whole country to choose Representatives in Congress. Nor would it be much better to have only thirty-eight districts—one for each State—to choose the Representatives, but there ought to be a separate district for every Representative, and these election districts should be small both in territory and population, so as to let every shade of opinion and every locality as well as every class or interest in society have its distinct organ.

In a representative government the majority in every election district ought to have a separate voice to speak and a vote to act in the Legislature, and where there are very many such districts, the concurrent, not the mere numerical majority speaks for the whole and reflects popular opinion fairly. Every constituent ought to be represented if possible in making the laws, but as the majority alone can rule in a republic the disfranchised minority should be as small as practicable, and the only way to effect this is by diminutive election districts. So that, whether as respects the majority or the minority, a large election district is bad in principle, only less bad than a single district for a whole State or the whole Union. The evil is of the same kind, only less in degree. This is true whether the election district is one of contracted area and dense population, as in a city, or of immense area and scant population as in the country. Even the French people, after their bitter experience, thoroughly understand this now. It was upon this very issue that they lately overthrew the ministry of their most popular statesman, Gambetta, he contending that representatives in the National Assembly should be chosen by general ticket in the departments, which correspond to our States, while they maintained it should be done in the arrondissements, which correspond to our counties.

In a city the laboring class naturally settles in a particular quarter, the manufacturing class in another quarter, the mercantile in another, the rich and fashionable class in still another, and the poor in yet another. It would be best to let each of these classes have a separate Representative if it could be so, but if the constituency be large the predominant class practically disfranchises all the others. So, likewise, in the country, the dominant class of a large election district necessarily governs it, wherefore it ought to be plain that the six hundred and fifty concurring majorities in the British House of Commons is a much better exponent of public opinion than the two hundred and ninety-three majorities in our House of Representatives. It is no exaggeration to say that every separate election district for the choice of a legislator is an additional fortification for the defense of liberty. Herein lies the strongest argument for sacredly preserving to the States of this Union the full exercise of all their reserved powers of sovereignty. Then, if the national Legislature should become corrupt, or if several State Legislatures should become so, other State Legislatures would still remain pure, and guard the freedom of the citizen.

A city election district containing a numerous constituency, say from one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand inhabitants, is very objectionable, and only less objectionable than an equal country constituency scattered over many thousand square miles of territory. In neither case can the Representative and constituent become as well acquainted as they ought. That acquaintanceship ought to have something of fire-side intimacy to beget a true representation; but what member of this House personally knows even one-fourth of the thirty or forty thousand voters that each of us represents? A few city members may know that proportion of their constituents, but where is the country member that does, whose district embraces many thousand square miles, as is the case with most of them? It is a singular fact that nearly all the Representatives of city constituencies here seem to prefer a small House, a dignified House, a good-mannered House.

It has been said that the responsibility of the Representative to his constituents diminishes as he gets nearer to them. Why, sir, what an absurdity. I can prove it to the satisfaction of any man on this floor by simply appealing to his experience and observation as to one fact, and that is, who feels his responsibility to his constituents more, a member on this floor or a member of a State Legislature? Why, sir, members of a State Legislature, except in those unfortunate communities where there is but a handful of them and where the wealthy men and corporations are eternally taking them up on the mountain in violation of the Lord's Prayer and offering them the gifts of the earth, [laughter,] I say except in those communities where the members are perpetually subjected to such temptation you all know how intensely the Representative feels his responsibility.

The House of Representatives of the American Congress should faithfully reflect the state of the times. In the eloquent language of Bill Allen, of Ohio, "it ought to be the exact image of the public will, the transcript of the public mind, the mirror of the public heart."

It can be all this only when it is a large House. Those who say 600 members would be too multitudinous must remember that this is a vast Government, covering a continent with 50,000,000 of people that shall be swelled into 250,000,000 at no distant day. They must also remember that this magnificent Republic has vast and varied interests, and therefore needs a vast representation to secure and guard those interests. The Representative and constituent should be in close contact, and anything which widens the distance between them will intrude influences to counteract the check that the constituency alone should exercise.

Another reason why we should double the numbers of this House is to divide the labor of members. That is a practical question worthy of serious consideration. We know that the people will not let us have each a clerk; and I do not see how we can get on well otherwise, unless we double the membership of the House and thus divide the toils and responsibilities of a Representative. I have as much as I can do; and although I do not represent an inventive constituency, I am annoyed a good deal with errands to the Patent Office and to the other Departments. If I represented a New England constituency I should dislike very much to undergo the labor which I imagine the Representatives of that inventive people have to undergo; and particularly if I represented a constituency that sent forth a large number of volunteers during the war who are now entitled to pensions. In that case I do not know what I should do. But of course if the members at present here will not attend to these matters for the people, somebody else will. [Laughter.]

It is to be deplored that the Constitution did not fix the maximum number of members of the House at the start, so as to have a constant number, as in the English Commons.

Every ten years now our Senate has a veto on how many members shall constitute the House. It can cut down the membership to one for each State, or raise it to not exceeding one for every 30,000 inhabitants. These are the extremes, and although the Constitution makes this House the sole judge of the qualifications and returns of its own members, and thereby seemingly rests the power of the House exclusively in itself, yet by letting the Senate have a voice in determining the numbers of the House it virtually places the House at the mercy of the Senate, which can force such a ratio of representation as to reduce the House even below the Senate in numbers and thereby practically destroy the representative principle.

These contradictory provisions of the Constitution evidently constitute one of those cases of omission which must occur in all free constitutions formed, as ours was, more by the foresight of theoretical wisdom than by slow and successive experience.

In making every apportionment there is always an apparent fierce conflict between the larger and smaller States, but really it is more a squabble as to which shall bear the loss of large fractions than any serious division on principle about what ratio shall be adopted. At the worst the large States only compel the small ones to endure loss of representation for the greatest fractions, but the Senate has several times amended the House bills of apportionment, and it cut the House down eighty-three members at one fell swoop in 1842, so that the Senate is as responsible for the present small size of the House as it is for the overshadowing power of the Executive and the miserable condition of the civil service.

It was solely from motives of economy that the framers of the Constitution failed to fix a definite number of members of the House as they did for the Senate. They thought the House could be increased each decade in proportion to the increase of wealth and population, and that thus the people would be saved the expense of paying for a maximum House from the start. But it was a great mistake, as the additional cost of a House of five or six hundred members from the date of the Constitution to the present hour would have been saved to the Government and the people a thousand times if such a House had existed. And so, too, the expense of a Senate of, say, 300, or about 6 from each State, 1 elected every year, would have been a mere trifle compared with the good it would have done. The surrender by the small Senate of its negative on removals from office at the commencement of General Washington's first term as President proves that perhaps the law-making body of a free people ought not to have any patronage whatever.

The Senate of Rome, which was the chief law-making power of the republic, consisted of three hundred members, yet patronage ultimately corrupted it and destroyed the commonwealth. But as it took five hundred years to do it, we may infer that if the American Senate had been larger it would not have voluntarily surrendered even to the Father of his Country the authority to remove from office without hinderance.

If this House had been left to itself to swell its numbers according to its own judgment, there is hardly a doubt but that this body would now be at least as large as the British Commons. Up to 1842 the House had steadily added to its numbers and gradually increased the ratio of representation also, the Senate not only concurring, but on two or three occasions actually insisting that the House should make itself larger.

Representation ought to increase with the growth of population and wealth in the country, and the framers of the Constitution so intended; but in the practice it has been otherwise. This was so previous to 1842, because until then no States had ever lost a Representative at any apportionment, except Delaware and Connecticut. But in 1842 the Senate completely reversed its policy in this regard and determined to restrain popular representation with a strong and heavy hand.

In that year the House passed the customary apportionment bill, providing for an increase of members to 306, and establishing the district system of electing them in place of by general ticket, which plan had prevailed in many of the States before that time. But when the bill came to the Senate it was amended so as to allow representation for fractions and to cut down the number of Representatives from 306 to 223—a reduction of 83 members. After a protracted struggle the House succumbed and the Senate's amendments became the law of the land. Those two amendments in my opinion had as much to do with bringing on the great civil war as any two provisions of law ever enacted by Congress. The policy thus inaugurated by the Senate was strictly adhered to at the next apportionment in 1852, and it was carried out by a coalition between the Southern States and the small States of the North, under the lead of John C. Calhoun. Each party to the alliance was actuated by very different motives.

Previous to 1842, there had been no uniform rule for electing members of Congress. The States of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Missouri, all small States as to population, elected by the general ticket; while New York and some other states had separate election districts of different sizes, some districts choosing two, some three, and some even four members, although most of the districts chose but one member. The whole of New York City constituted at that date but one election district, choosing four members.

As long as there was no representation for fractions the small States of the North contended for a large House, to diminish the unrepresented fractions as much as possible. So, likewise, as long as Representatives in Congress could be chosen by the general ticket system those same small States were afraid that the large States might resort to that mode of election and overwhelm the little States in the House. But with the district system established by law and the certainty of many Congressional districts in the large States electing Representatives friendly to the dominant political party in the small States, the latter were eager to reduce the number of the House, because it would relatively increase their strength in the electoral college.

Similar motives, of course, governed the small States of the South, but both the small and large States of that section were prompted to favor a reduction of the House because it was supposed a small House would strengthen the sentiment of State sovereignty and promote the interests of slavery by having but few legislators from each State at the national capital, and by forcing most of the intellectual, ambitious young men of each State to make a reputation in their own State capital, if at all. If representation had been apportioned in 1842 and again in 1852 as it had been previously done, there would have been over three hundred members for the one decade and very nearly four hundred during the other. Now, if the House of Representatives had been thus large during those twenty years of more or less fierce agitation on the slavery question there would have been a vast deal of more friendly intercourse between the sections than there was, and war might have been averted. A large number of the master spirits of each State, with their families and friends, would have met at the national capital and had social communion, intermarrying, and mutual sympathy for each other, as well as regard for the Government. And this would have sent such a stream of warm national blood bounding through the body politic as would have prevented any serious thought of secession in any quarter; and might have adjusted even the slavery question on the basis of just compensation. But as it was, for the most of the time there was only a cold and formal diplomatic intercourse kept up by a scant representation of the people, while thousands of leading men at home in the States during that long period who were denied the opportunity to display themselves on a national arena vied with each other in aggravating the sectional quarrel instead of trying to compose it, as would have been the case if there had uniformly been a full representation of the people. In the latter event, the thoughts and the affections of the Southern people in particular would have centered around the national capital more and at their State capitals less.

In 1842, after the House had disagreed to the Senate amendments, and the latter came up for reconsideration in the Senate, on a motion to insist upon the amendment to allow representation for fractions, the vote stood, yeas 24, nays 18, thirteen of the yeas being from the South. And, on a motion to insist upon the second amendment to reduce the number of the House, the vote was, yeas 30, nays 14, more than half the yeas again being from the South. It was boldly avowed in the debate by several of the Southern Senators that "the peculiar principles of the South, and every interest it cherished," were to be protected by the district system, by representation of fractions, and above all by a reduction of the House. Senator Preston declared:

> What was wanted in Congress was that the people of each State should be represented in proportion to their interest in the general Government, but if the principle is carried so far as to divert the entire interest of representation toward Congress, the greatest danger of consolidation and centralization must be the result.

Besides, he considered there was great necessity for the immediate protection of the small States, the Senate being overshadowed by the other branches. The House and the Executive being both elected by the same constituency would have naturally a tendency to consolidation against the controlling power—the Senate. Mr. Preston was for a House of 150, which would have assimilated it to the Senate, only making it a weaker body because elected for but two years.

I have given what I believe were the real reasons and motives that controlled the Senate in so violently interfering with the organization of the House. It is true other reasons were assigned, but doubtless they were only fictitious, or at the best but secondary. Among the rest, Senator Preston, of South Carolina, said he was "in favor of the old notion that the Representatives ought to be in the proportion of three to one. A proper relation ought to subsist between the two legislative branches of this Government. The members of the other House had a direct interest in keeping up these numbers, but the Senate had a further interest in preserving the equilibrium and in preserving its own powers undiminished by an apparently overwhelming majority. It was a difficult matter to stand up against the moral influence of large majorities. He did not desire to see the House of Representatives so exclusively popular as to overlie the Senate. He would not have the Senate's moral influence diminished, and he must be permitted to add that large assemblages were liable to sudden impulses of caprice, were calculated to operate upon the more mature and calm deliberations of the co-ordinate body when engaged in the performance of its highest duty."

Here was an honest confession of jealousy, which regarded the House as a rival of the Senate before the people for power and popularity. Other Senators avowed the same feelings of rivalry and distrust, and perhaps the bill got several votes in the Senate on this account. In the same debate, John J. Crittenden said:

> As to the plea of that body (House) obtaining too great an ascendency, there could be no objection in that if the popular branch truly represented the popular will, and in no way could that be so fully attained as by an enlarged number of Representatives. There was, however, no danger of such an ascendency. The great danger and tendency of this Government was toward executive ascendency and domination. So great had this tendency been that there were now no means left of obtaining a due controlling power but by a larger representation of the people, and by bringing into the legislative branch in which the popular will is immediately reflected the overpowering and irresistible evidence of the popular will.

What Mr. Crittenden said about executive ascendency in 1842 is still more applicable in 1882. Who is so responsible for the present executive ascendency as the Senate, which has twice violently changed the Constitution, first, in abdicating its negative on appointments to office, and, second, in forcing a reduction of the House in 1842 and subsequently? The great political misfortunes of the people of the United States have arisen not so much from the large size of the House as from the small size of the Senate. Even now, if the Senate were a larger body, it might possibly still assert its jurisdiction over executive removals from office if it could resist the temptation which was too strong for it in 1789. Mr. Calhoun frequently participated in the exciting and exhaustive debate in 1842, asserting that he supported the bill in the interests of the small States, and also because if the House were increased to 300 members "the result would be to make the sessions of Congress continuous. There would be hardly time given to go home and return." He advocated cutting the House down to the lowest possible number that it could be brought to submit to.

While he thus spoke as a Senator in 1842, he forgot the position he had taken as a member of the House thirty years before, when he delivered his masterly maiden effort in 1812 denouncing the usurpation of the Senate in daring to amend an apportionment bill from the House at all.

How egregiously Mr. Calhoun was mistaken in supposing the sessions of Congress would be "continuous" if the House were increased to 300 may be seen in the fact that the House has consisted of over 300 Representatives and Delegates for the last ten years, yet the sessions of Congress during that time have been no longer than they were in 1842 and for many years previous.

The long sessions of Congress generally last about seven months, and the short sessions of course only three, giving an average of about one session of five months every year, which is about the same time that the French National Assembly sits, and about a month less than the English Parliament.

But it is contended by some that as our people have State Legislatures to enact local laws, when the representation for that purpose is added to the representation in Congress for national objects the American citizen has more representation than the inhabitants of any free country in Europe. But not so, as the people of each canton of Switzerland, as well as of each province, county, or municipality in the other free States of Europe, have local legislatures to correspond with ours.

Shortly after the adoption of the Constitution many of the States did reduce the representation in their Legislatures, and some of them reduced that representation by far too much, notably New York and Pennsylvania, the two largest States in the Union. Down to 1801 the constitution of New York provided by article 16 that "the number of senators shall never exceed 100, nor the number of the Assembly 300," and prescribed the method for apportioning them. But in 1801 this was unfortunately amended so as to limit the senate to 32 members, at which figure it has remained ever since, and the house to not exceeding 150 members, which number was still further reduced, in 1821, to 128. Think of it, the great State of New York with only 32 senators and 128 representatives, the same number in each house that she has had for sixty years, although within that time her population has nearly quadrupled and her wealth octupled; and although within that time she has held one constitutional convention, in 1846, and has ratified ten or dozen amendments to her constitution, yet she has never increased the representation of the people an iota. Think of it again, that New York has 33 members of Congress, and only 32 senators in the State Legislature. If I were asked what I regard as the worst thing ever done against good government in New York, I should say it was the repeal of that provision of her old Constitution, which provided for a Senate of 100 members and a House of 300; and if I lived in the State now I would agitate and agitate, or have it restored as a part of the Constitution.

The people of the great State of Pennsylvania, from 1790 to 1873, when the present constitution was adopted, had even less representation than those of New York. Their constitution of 1790 said "the number of representatives shall never be less than 60 nor greater than 100, and the senators never less than one-fourth nor more than one-third of the number of representatives," according to the conditions prescribed for apportioning both houses. Conforming to these conditions made the senate of Pennsylvania consist of 33 members previous to 1873, and the house to 100. When it is remembered how small have been the legislative bodies in both of these populous and wealthy States, ought any one to be surprised at the wholesale corruption which is alleged and believed to have existed in them for a long while? It is a notorious fact, believed by every intelligent man in the country, that Tweed bribed at least five senators in the New York Legislature at one time to get a bill through regulating the municipal affairs of New York City so as to authorize him and his partners in crime to rob the people.

But I need not go into particulars. The great Erie railroad ring, the canal ring, the Central road ring, the municipal government rings, the elevated railroad rings, and the Jay Goulds, the Vanderbilts, and the thousand other millionaires of New York have so many tempting bribes to offer for privileges to plunder the public that one is astonished if so small a Legislature is not bought and sold more or less at every session. Indeed the metropolitan press of the State do generally charge both houses of the Legislature with corruption at every session. This is known of all men, and, what is worse, the charge is generally believed to be true, and in many cases considered proven to be. In fact, the illustrated newspapers of the metropolis have for many years teemed with cartoons implying corruption at Albany.

Not very long ago a committee of the New York Legislature examined Jay Gould as to his policy of manipulating votes and legislators, and he frankly admitted that when in a Republican district he was a Republican; when in a Democratic district he was a Democrat; but he was for Erie all the time. He also declared that he could get a better return for his money among members of the Legislature after they had been elected than he could by expending it among the voters at the polls.

The same may be said of the Pennsylvania Legislature previous to 1873, when the present constitution of that State, which greatly enlarges representation in both houses, was adopted. For many years before the change, and while she only had 33 senators and 100 representatives, her Legislature acted more like a broker's shop, dealing with the lobby in charters and peculation, than like the law-making power of a great and free State. It was often alleged and believed that one or both bodies were bribed by corporations or capitalists for privileges and monopolies; but since she has had 50 Senators and 201 Representatives a better state of things has prevailed, and now the people, both at home and abroad, have more faith in the purity of the Legislature of the Keystone State.

I will mention two well-known facts in the history of Pennsylvania that forcibly illustrate the difference between the action of her former small Legislature and her present large one in face of temptation. The former, in the year ——, granted a gigantic monopoly exclusive privileges to erect a boom at Williamsport, on the Susquehanna River, for catching and mooring timber rafts and lumber. The owners of the franchise literally robbed the public of a mint of money every year; but all efforts to abolish the monopoly or to reduce its charges were unavailing in the old small Legislature, while there was no trouble to correct the abuse in the present enlarged houses.

The other "well-known fact," to which I refer, is the Pittsburgh riot bill, which came so near passing both houses even of the present Legislature, to corruptly appropriate about four millions of the people's money to make good the losses of private individuals by the labor riots in 1877. The great fraud was exposed just in time to prevent its consummation, and no doubt it was done by some new members, some honest, fresh blood that would not have been circulating in the legislative body if the old constitution had been in existence at the time.

Why, Mr. Speaker, some years ago, before Pennsylvania adopted her present constitution, in 1873, I remember reading this paragraph in a newspaper. It was not put there as a joke. It was in the Associated Press dispatches as a fact, vouched for by the association which had sent it. Some member rose in the popular branch of the Legislature and made the following motion:

> Mr. Speaker, I move that as Tom Scott has no further business for this Legislature to transact, this house do now adjourn sine die.

[Laughter.]

It has likewise often been charged, and believed, that money has frequently and successfully been used to carry elections for United States Senators in the small Legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania. Only a few months ago a most disgraceful scene was presented at Albany illustrating the truth of this remark.

Again, when we turn our eyes toward the small Legislatures of the West what do we behold? Nevada, with but 25 senators and 50 representatives; while Colorado has but 26 senators and 49 representatives. Is it not both charged and believed that a majority of each of these petty Legislatures are bribed at every session, and especially at every election for United States Senator, by either the railway, mining, and other corporations, or by the bonanza capitalists?

Leading newspapers in many parts of the United States have, furthermore, during the last few years charged openly and boldly that several members of the small body at the other end of the Capitol were either elected by corrupt practices or are corruptly employed by the corporations and monopolies of the country to legislate for their best interests instead of for the public good. I do not say that these charges are true, but I do say they exist, and that they are credited in many sections of the country. Nor do I say that the Legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania, of Nevada and Colorado, or of any other State or States, are corrupt. I simply remark that they are charged with corruption—that it is believed by vast numbers of men; and I contend that every legislative assembly of a free people ought to be above suspicion, which can best be secured in this case only by having the body so large that it will cost a world of money and trouble to bribe the majority.

The people of New York or Nevada or of any other State where the Legislature has been debauched or only suspected of it are just as good on the average as the people of the remaining States, that have large Legislatures which cannot be bribed. It is the system of small Legislatures that I condemn, not the people who suffer by it. They deserve commiseration; and it is a sad thing for the law-making power of any free government to be suspected of corruption even when innocent of it, because such a suspicion is most demoralizing and injurious.

From this dark picture of the injuries wrought by the Legislature of the Federal Government and of several of the States being too small let us cast our attention to New England, where Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut each have over two hundred and forty members of the lower house of their Legislature, and New Hampshire over three hundred, actually more representatives of the people than this House has. Little Rhode Island, which is not as large in territory as either of half a dozen counties in my own small State, has thirty-six senators and seventy-two representatives. Rhode Island with four more Senators than New York, the greatest State in the Union!

These New England States reduced their several Legislatures somewhat, too, after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, on account of the latter dividing the power to make laws, but they never forgot John Adams's advice, that to keep the Legislatures from corruption it must be a little mass-meeting. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Massachusetts Legislature, when it made laws for the State of Maine as well as for her present territory, contained over seven hundred members, and we have the authority of Judge Woodbury, former United States Senator and Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, that the body was not unwieldy nor disorderly.

Now, who ever heard of one of these monster New England Legislatures being bribed or intimidated for anything, either to elect a Senator or grant a monopoly? There must be some very strong reason, some overpowering influence, to make the New Englander endure the heavy tax necessary to pay these multitudinous legislatures. Then why is it, what is it, that induces a New Englander to cheerfully submit to this heavy pecuniary burden, when the god of his idolatry is said to be the almighty dollar? It is the teaching of John Adams, and if it be true that the Yankee kneels only to the golden calf, again I ask how Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Vermont with over 240 members in the popular branch of their Legislatures and New Hampshire with over 300, actually more than the whole people of the United States have got to represent them here in this House—I say that if there be not some great merit in a legislative assembly which can neither be bribed nor intimidated, and which nobody will even suspect of either, if there be not some great merit in it, is it not a mystery that these money-worshipers whose Bible is their ledger will submit to the enormous tax necessary to support such a large legislative assembly, and do it cheerfully, and every time the question is proposed to reduce the number never to submit to it?

Among all the great men who took part in the construction and organization of our splendid system of national and State governments, three names stand out in bold and perpetual relief. These are John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and Alexander Hamilton. These three men impressed themselves upon American polity in a way that no time can efface as long as the Republic shall last, and of the three I must say, in all sincerity, I think John Adams did most for his country and the cause of human liberty by conceiving the idea of a little mass meeting of representatives for a legislative assembly and choosing them by a myriad of small election districts called townships. Yes, sir, the petty township of New England as a legislative, administrative, and judicial subdivision of the State—a sort of sovereignty of its own—is the greatest contribution to civil liberty that has ever been made by mortal man. Adams taught his people to keep their political affairs in their own hands and to distrust every public officer clothed with legislative authority, or even with judicial or executive authority. He likewise taught them there is safety as well as wisdom in a multitude of councilors. He indelibly impressed upon them the danger of a few influential and wealthy men or families corruptly using the law-making power for private ends, and that the best way to prevent it was to have a host of legislators chosen by small election districts. He counselled them not to regard public officers as necessarily corrupt, but only as corruptible.

In other words, John Adams instructed the New England people to look upon the township as the citadel of their liberties, while Thomas Jefferson advised the southern people to regard the States only, no matter how organized, as the palladium of freedom. Hamilton, on the other hand, told his people to lean on the one-man power, or at the most to rely on an aristocracy of a few voters, as the wisest course to have a good government. As a member of the convention that framed the Federal Constitution, by the brilliancy of his genius, the wealth of his learning, and the force of his character, he impressed many of his peculiar views on that instrument, and his malign influence crops out at several places in it; in fact, I think he is chargable with more of its faults and defects than any other man. His political opinions still dominate New York, Pennsylvania, and the Middle States generally. Especially do they pervade New York, where the one-man power is worshiped as much as the "many-man" theory is in New England, or State sovereignty at the South.

To-day Hamilton's spirit presides at the National capital, Jefferson's at the State capitals, and Adams's at the township halls, and of the three men, I repeat, I do not hesitate here and now and in this presence, as a South Carolinian, to say I believe John Adams did more for civil liberty in New England than any other man who ever drew breath upon its soil, [applause;] and if you will pardon me for indulging in the spirit of prophecy, I predict that when the future historian shall come to write the epic of the decline and fall of the great American Republic, he will have to record that the last and most desperate struggle for liberty in this Union occurred in the town halls of sturdy New England. [Applause.]

I call upon the New Englanders on this floor to give us a New England House of Representatives here; to extend to the whole nation the blessings of a national township legislature. I have often thought the greatest misfortune of the American people has been that John Adams was absent acting as Minister to England at the time when he ought to have been helping to frame the Constitution of the United States. If he had participated in the construction of that instrument, I cannot help but believe that he would have impressed upon the Federal Constitution something more of a permanent and numerous legislative assembly chosen by small districts than it has now.

Some men may object to a big House of Representatives on account of the expense of paying the members, but such picayune patriots deserve both pity and contempt. The American people are amply able to pay for the best government that money can secure, and he who is ready to barter his liberty for gold is fitted only to be a slave and deserves to wear the collar of a master. If we had a House of 600, the additional cost would not exceed $2,000,000 a year; and I am satisfied that such a House would save that amount ten times over at every session of Congress. If it saved only one Pacific mail subsidy, or one Northern Pacific land grab, or one arrearages of pensions folly every twenty years, it would abundantly repay its cost in preserving the morality of both public and private life. Others object to a large House because it is unwieldy and at times becomes turbulent, acting like a mob. No doubt a single despot, or a triumvirate, or a "Council of Ten" could legislate with great dispatch and dignity. I imagine the law-making power of China is the most dignified body in the world, and can pass an act affecting the welfare of millions with the utmost ease. But is it a desirable thing to be able to pass laws in haste? Why does the Constitution require a bill to be read in each House on each of three separate days? One of the greatest blessings of republican government is that bad measures cannot be hurried through. A large body, however, always acts promptly when it has public sentiment with it, and only hesitates or finds difficulty in passing measures when it is doubtful whether the people favor them. Should this be otherwise if we are to have free government? We had no difficulty in passing the free quinine bill when the body politic had the chills and fever and ordered us to relieve it. [Laughter.] Acceptable measures always pass readily. It is only when there is a difference of opinion that there is obstruction and delay. Buckle well says:

> Every great reform which has been affected has consisted, not in doing something new but in undoing something old. The most valuable additions made to legislation have been enactments destructive of preceding legislation, and the best laws which have been passed have been those by which some former laws were repealed.

What an absurdity to say that a small body of Representatives can act best while it takes a large body of the people to do best; that the people's agents can do better in small numbers while the people themselves can do best only in large numbers. Such a proposition questions the ability of the people to govern themselves, because it assumes that the country can be best governed by the wisdom of its Representatives in Congress acting per se, and not by the wisdom of the people. Montesquien, the great French political philosopher, as some call him, says that every law-making body of more than one hundred men degenerates into a mob, a sort of bear garden; and this I suppose is the reason why so many States of the Union have limited their house of representatives to 100 members.

Now, this Frenchman, who picked up in England what little knowledge of free institutions he possessed, might have found a convincing argument against his theory in the British Commons. That body does sometimes seemingly act like a pandemonium to a superficial observer, by crowing like cocks, braying like asses, shuffling feet, coughing, &c., but it is all in good humor nine times out of ten simply to silence a bore. The Roman Senate, Cicero tells us, used to do the same thing for the same purpose. A man must either talk sense or fun to be listened to with attention long in any large deliberative assembly. Occasionally a few members, say half a dozen of the Commons or of this House, forget the proprieties, but to reduce the size of the House on that account would be to condemn the Representatives of the people for being what their constituents desire them to be. If they are not what the people wish, they can easily be changed when a new election occurs. There is always more or less tumult among a large body of free men, whether they be educated gentlemen or illiterate rustics. It is a concomitant of freedom that scorns to speak with bated breath or tread with tender feet in any presence. It is the spirit of liberty airing itself. Something of eternal violence as well as eternal vigilance is an attendant on liberty. Even only two freemen will now and then have fierce discord, especially when making, expounding, or executing laws for others. In proportion to numbers and relative ages of the members of the two Houses, about as many disgraceful scenes, as they are sometimes called, have occurred in the Senate of the United States as in the House.

When some one tried to persuade Lord Palmerston to enact tyrannical laws to restrain dram drinking in England, he replied, "I would rather have England free than sober."

In the great debate that occurred in the United States Senate in 1842, when the Constitution was violently changed by the compulsory reduction of the House by the Senate, Mr. Allen, affectionately called "Old Bill Allen" by the American people, made a grand speech, in which he said:

> You might as well say you would abandon the earth because it was subject to earthquakes, as to say that you would refuse to have large legislative bodies lest confusion should arise therefrom, or because they may be subject occasionally to bursts of passion. What body or assemblage of men is not? Have we not witnessed scenes of disorder even here? It is in accordance with the genius and nature of free institutions. I would rather enjoy a turbulent liberty than be subject to a cold and heartless despotism. Reduce the House to a body of some forty or fifty, and what would it become? Would it be a representative of the nation? No, sir; no. It would represent nothing but its own views; it would be nothing more than the receptacle of silent, deep-rooted corruption. Sir, numbers are a great security against corruption. Numbers are a great security against inertness. Such a body impresses those who act in it with a sense of propriety and of dignity. It gives clearness and distinctness to truth, and it has the effect of attracting public notice to its proceedings. Sir, I have heard it said that Congress is becoming odious in the eyes of the people. I do not think so. It is said everybody talks about Congress. This is the very thing I would desire they should do. The very moment the people quit talking about Congress, Congress will quit talking about them and our Government will become a despotism. Would you annihilate the press because it may indulge in licentiousness? Would you silence debate because debate is sometimes turbulent? Would you silence debate because there are men who may express sentiments hostile to your own? No, sir; no. The expression of the multifarious sentiments of members should be unrestricted and they should be laid before the people, furnishing the great book of their political knowledge.

He also said the House and the Senate "are rival branches—rivals for public favor—rivals in the acquisition of power. Shall we, then, sitting as a rival body, seek to augment our own power by diminishing theirs."

But this eloquent appeal and this unanswerable logic failed to convince. The small States and the Southern States—in other words, State sovereignty and slavery—would not heed the voice of wisdom and the war followed, which might have been averted by abolishing slavery for reasonable compensation, which I believe would have been done had the Federal House of Representatives been properly increased in 1842 and 1852, instead of being reduced as they were. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. WELLBORN,] in his fiery onslaught upon a large House, quoted a passage from Mr. Madison's fifty-eighth number of the Federalist to the effect that a large House would present the countenance of a democracy, but it would be animated by the soul of an oligarchy. The gentleman also said:

> Numbers alone have not in the past, nor will they ever in the future, secure the enactment of wise and wholesome laws.

If this be true then the laws enacted by the numerous Legislatures of New England and by the multitudinous Houses of Parliament in Old England must be very unwise and very unwholesome. I dare say the people of those countries would differ with my friend from Texas. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] avowed similar views. He remarked:

> If it be said that large bodies are more republican, I answer that the largest bodies are born of monarchy or oligarchy.

There spoke a New York man—one under the spell of Hamilton. Why, sir, you can no more get a New York politician to go counter to Hamilton's theories than you could get a camel to go through the eye of a needle.

The gentleman [Mr. COX] further said in his speech on apportionment at the last session of Congress:

> One only out of twenty of the British people at the present time vote. There is no trace of representative government based on a census.

He then quotes approvingly a passage from Judge Story's Commentaries on the Constitution to this effect:

> That the House of Commons is made up of representatives of old and decayed boroughs, in some cases with scarcely a single inhabitant; and of the 558 members then and there (in England and Wales) one-ninth were elected by 364 persons, and one-half by 5,723 persons, and the half are representative of other than popular interests.

Now, in answer to both the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Texas, I would say first that it is a misnomer to call the government of England an "oligarchy" or to assert that numbers have not had much, in fact most, to do with the enactment of wise laws in England. Why, Mr. Speaker, whence do we get habeas corpus, trial by jury, and independence of the judiciary? Whence do we get the noble maxims that no slave can breathe the air of England, that a man's house is his castle, that he must be presumed to be innocent until he is proven to be guilty? Whence come the immortal Common Law and its inspired codifier, Blackstone? In short, whence come even Magna Charta and our Bill of Rights?

Talk of England being an oligarchy—of the House of Commons not being a representative assembly nor a deliberative body. Why, Mr. Speaker, has not the House of Commons built up the mightiest power in the world by enforcing popular rights and controlling even the monarch and nobles of the realm, as well as by subjecting to its moral and practical influence every branch of the government antagonistic to the rights of the humblest citizen? For nearly two hundred years no authority in England has dared to stand up for one moment against the will of the majority of the Commons. Again, my information differs from that of the gentleman when he says, "there is no trace of representative government based on a census in England." It is true, representation in Parliament is not apportioned every ten years as with us, but only at irregular intervals by a reform bill. However, it is an indisputable fact that regard is had to the census whenever a new reform bill is passed, so as to equalize the representation as near as may be. Each election district in England is treated virtually as a corporation and so much representation is assigned to it until the next reform bill shall be passed; but, I repeat, population has more to do with the assignment than anything else. This corporate apportionment of representation in the State Legislature is practiced in Georgia, in most of the New England States, and in some of the other States.

Furthermore, when the gentleman says, "one only out of twenty of the British people at the present time vote," he is either mistaken or he is disingenuous, and can take either horn of the dilemma. On this subject I quote from an authority which the gentleman himself will not dispute. I mean The Statesman's Year Book for 1880, by Martin. At page 198 that author gives the total number of voters in the United Kingdom at 2,999,229, which shows nearly half of the male adults of England vote. So that unless the gentleman means to include the women and children as not voting, or means the entire people of the colonies, including India—if he refers alone to men, he is clearly mistaken.

Representation was thoroughly reformed in England in 1832—a half century ago; and it has been reapportioned on several occasions since, extending the suffrage every time, until now it may fairly be said England has a better representation than we have. It is true she has not universal suffrage, and God forbid she ever should have, because universal suffrage will lead to universal damnation wherever and whenever it may be tried, [laughter,] but she has a generous, liberal suffrage, sufficient to express the real will of the people. Yes, sir, I do not mince words. Universal suffrage does lead to universal demoralization. I have had that demonstrated to me, sir, by several years of close observation and bitter experience near home. [Laughter.] And, Mr. Speaker, I see some gentlemen before me from Massachusetts and Rhode Island who have been disfranchising white men, and I think they must have the same opinions as I do about universal suffrage. In fact all my friends of the Republican party—for I am glad to say we are on the eve of the era of good feeling, if we have not actually entered upon it—I say that I believe that all my friends admit that there is a great deal of truth in my remarks, by the course they have pursued in respect to suffrage in this District. They gave certain colored people the right to vote; in other words, universal suffrage, and to get rid of it and its horrors they had to disfranchise a considerable number of white voters, too. And now, sir, I should like to know from any gentleman on the Republican side, or any other side, who is disposed to dispute the proposition that universal suffrage leads to universal damnation, to explain why they have deprived both white and black of suffrage here, if they do not agree with me. [Laughter.] True, you have got rid of the affliction here, but it is still a festering ulcer on the body politic from the Potomac to the Rio Grande.

How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Several MEMBERS. Go on; you shall have plenty of time.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, I will not trespass upon the time or temper of the House. I have not said one-fourth part of what I desire to say in favor of a House of 600 members, but I will not trespass upon the forbearance of the House, for I know they are ready to vote on this bill, to finish up that little "Seaton bantam." [Laughter.] Hence, Mr. Speaker, I will bring my remarks to a close within the time allowed me by the House.

Now, sir, I ask for a big representation here. I beg my friends from New York, Nevada, and Colorado to go for large representations here and then at home, in order, as I said awhile ago, that the people may feel secure that their Representatives are not subordinating public authority to private interests. Above all I want a large representation upon the floors of Congress. I would like above all things to see 300 members in the other end of the Capitol, to place that body above suspicion. [Laughter and applause.] I do not say it in any offensive sense. I only say that the papers have charged—and some of the people believe it—that some of the members even of that high body were elected by corrupt means; and if they were not, they have been employed by corporations and lobbyists since their election. I do not, sir, as I said, mean it in any offensive sense toward that body. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLANE. You want the protection of numbers.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes. Little Maryland has not as many members in her Legislature as she ought to have; and if my friend will permit me to tell him why it is, I will give him the reason. She is too near New York. [Laughter.]

As an evidence that at this moment England is more democratic than even the United States, we have only to remember that she has an income tax, and has had ever since 1842. That income tax is the stand-by to make up all deficiencies in the public revenues. During the Crimean war it was as high as sixteen pence per pound. Of course it is a tax on capital, a tax on the rich; while we have no income tax and levy all our burdens on consumption—in other words, on the poor—while the millionaires pay nothing.

To prove that the multitudinous houses of the British Parliament do enact "wise and wholesome laws," as well as beget a free and manly public spirit, and also to prove that the large size of those houses has had a great deal to do with their success in establishing justice and promoting the cause of liberty, we have only to recall an historical incident mentioned by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. WELLBORN,] in his eloquent speech on this bill the other day, in which he cited what passed between Charles the First and Mr. Speaker Lenthall, which Macaulay has so graphically described. The king, as you all know, entered the House of Commons for the purpose of arresting five members who had offended him, and having taken the speaker's chair asked him whether any of the five members that he came to apprehend were in the house; whether he saw any of them, and where they were? Mr. Lenthall proudly made answer:

> May it please your majesty, I have neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak in this place but as the house is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am here, and humbly beg your majesty's pardon that I cannot give any other answer than this to what your majesty is pleased to demand of me.

Now, I ask my friend from Texas if that speaker would ever have dared hold that high language if he had not had a house of five hundred brave, educated, determined freemen there to back him? I hope he will answer the question. [After a pause.] He cannot answer it, I think, except by admitting that the speaker would not have used such language to a Stuart unless he had been supported by men that he knew would die with him if necessary, and before dying would shake England from center to circumference.

Mr. WELLBORN. I did not understand, from the way in which the gentleman spoke, whether he desired an answer now or not. I do not wish to interrupt him without his consent.

Mr. TILLMAN. I only wanted to ask whether you think that speaker would have talked in that heroic strain if he had not had a very strong backing?

Mr. WELLBORN. Well, I will say in answer to the gentleman's question, that under the rules governing the British House of Commons, only forty members are needed to constitute a quorum; and it may be that Speaker Lenthall, when Charles invaded that chamber, had but forty men at his back.

Mr. TILLMAN. That, Mr. Speaker, we know is not the historical fact. The entire House almost to a man was there, in spirit at least, if not in person; especially the friends of liberty and the champions of free government. They are always on hand when needed in the House of Commons. A great occasion invariably brings them forth.

I would also like to ask the gentleman from Texas if he believes Pym and Hampden and the other many brave patriots who have immortalized the British Commons would have been successful or have had courage to struggle so manfully for liberty if they had not felt the touch of several hundred elbows supporting them against the Crown? Whether the House of Commons is an oligarchy or not, and whether it is a representative body or not, it has been representative enough and large enough and brave enough for several hundred years to fight the king, fight the nobility, and fight the flesh and the devil in the cause of liberty; and we are enjoying to-day what that mass meeting of six hundred and fifty-eight of the people's representatives have established for the good of mankind. Representative government and all Europe is likewise profiting by the example.

I will next address myself to the objection urged against a large House by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HERBERT.] He said in effect a large House creates confusion and obstructs legislation by preventing the dispatch of business. In making laws there is something else besides efficient and practical government to look after. It is quite as important to prevent the passage of a bad law as it is to enact a good one. "It would be better for the country to debate a single subject two months and then negative it, if its passage would do injury, than during the same time to pass one hundred bad laws." The object of every free government is not so much to pass a certain number of laws within a certain time as to pass good laws. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] further said if each member of a large House spoke his hour, it would consume a great number of days to consider even the most trivial subject. Now, what single member cares to speak an hour on an insignificant theme, and what necessity is there for every member of the House, or even half of them, or a fourth of them, or a tenth, or a twentieth of them to speak? Speaking ought not to have much effect on either House of Congress, and does not have. A member of the national Legislature ought to be a person of fixed principles and a storehouse of facts, so as to be able to think and act for himself. Oral speeches do good before the people at the hustings and printed speeches sent out by Congressmen among their constituents accomplish excellent results in giving the people a political education. But it is voting correctly and being present to vote that constitutes a good legislator. The leading English newspapers are accustomed to say that the model member of Parliament is one who is "never present at a debate and never absent at a division or committee."

To print a speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without having delivered it orally will not make it read any the worse in the country. Neither the rhetoric nor the logic will suffer by it in the estimation of the people. Some of the most gifted statesmen the world has ever seen could not speak at all. Thomas Jefferson never tried it but once, yet he made himself President of the United States with his pen. Oliver Cromwell, one of the greatest rulers that ever guided the destinies of the greatest nation in the world, talked nonsense as an orator, and William of Orange, perhaps a still greater statesman, could not talk at all. Able members of Congress can always find an appreciative audience to read their productions. Hence they need not care so much for the opinion of either the House or the galleries of the Capitol. After voting correctly the next best thing a model member of Congress can do is occasionally to write out and publish a good argument or essay, called a speech through politeness, and send it broadcast over the land. Members always subscribe liberally for each other's good speeches for free distribution.

But even when members of Congress debate too much it cannot be denied that their talking does good; as an abstract of the debate is published in all the newspapers, it is thus that the people get informed on their affairs. The public documents and speeches sent out by members of Congress shed a flood of light on business and government. Parliament means government by talking, but talking more in voting ay and no correctly than in making speeches. There is much less use for oratory now in a legislative assembly than formerly. The press to a very great extent has superseded the orator of ancient times in discussing laws and maturing public opinion for or against them. Yes, sir, the men up yonder in the reporters' gallery have as much share almost in legislation as we do as far as argument and discussion is concerned. Voting is the most important part of a modern legislator's duty. That is practical and useful. One of the best safeguards against too much speaking on this floor would be to make the House larger, not smaller. As long as it remains a comparatively small body like it is now there will be no end of speech-making, but if we had 600 members no one but a fool would expect a speech from every member on every subject, or indeed upon any subject. So the way to silence the windmill is to increase the House. The present number of the House is the very worst that could be selected anyhow. "It is too many for calmness and deliberation in debate and too few to insure the full operation of the congregated mass of intellect which pervades the people at large."

But it is said that we are already a mob, and that this Hall cannot hold many more members. As to the first, of course we are a legislative mob according to the definition of that charlatan Frenchman—Montesquieu—who, in my opinion, has been more overrated than any author that ever wrote a successful book. I admit that after any assembly of men passes one hundred and fifty, unless in a hall constructed with particular reference to acoustics, the excess of numbers cannot hear understandingly what is going on. The members thus situated on the outskirts take but little interest in what is said, and either chat privately among themselves—perchance in discussing the very measure their colleagues are considering—or they leave the hall. This is the true cause of most of the confusion, noise, and mob-like conduct that so disturbed Montesquieu, and still disturbs some men who are fond of quiet, order, and solemn dignity.

The gentleman from Alabama seems shocked because a big bell is rung to summon absentees and stragglers in the House of Commons whenever a vote is to be taken. What is there wrong in that? Is it not customary to ring a bell to summon any big crowd of laborers to their work, and are we anything but legislative laborers employed by the people to make their laws? Why, sir, I think if we had a bell just under the Goddess of Liberty in the dome of the Capitol, it would save the pages, and members too, many hurried steps. It is a well-known fact that of the six hundred and fifty-eight members of which the House of Commons now consists, over six hundred have voted again and again and again during the present century. A great occasion always brings them out. In fact, they are but a grand inquest of the country.

Who cares to have a full House here to do mere routine duty? The appropriation bills must be passed; the ordinary necessities of the Government must be met; appropriations required by law must be put through. Particular committees have charge of these subjects, and if they do anything amiss they are responsible to the House and to their constituents. Why do we need all to be present to transact mere business of course?

As to the Hall not having space for much increase of members, I do not see the force of it. It would be very easy to remove the board partitions from the space under some, or even all of the galleries, and thereby make room enough for a thousand members, if necessary. Besides, these stationery boxes, or, more elegantly, writing-desks, could and ought to be taken out of here, which would give ample room in the Hall, as it now stands, for six hundred Representatives. A large arm-chair, with a small box for stationery attached to one of the arms, would amply suffice for writing purposes here as it does in the Legislatures of New England; or we could have straight benches, as they do in the British Commons, for men to sit on while writing or taking part in debate. No one is allowed to read a speech, or have a writing-desk, or even a particular seat, in the House of Commons, and so entirely do the wise, practical English people regard the vote of a member as of more consequence than his speeches, or attendance on other members' speeches, that they have not even provided seats for more than about half of the members, and when a full House attend, they have to stand or sit in the galleries. The reason why this House is so hard to manage is, that we attempt to govern by rules suited only to a very small body. Our committees are so small as to be contemptible, and they remind one of the petty committees of the petty Legislature of Pennsylvania previous to 1873. Our work should be done entirely by committees, but the committees should be representative, at least double if not treble their present size, and each committee should act as lawyers managing cases, and so control all the speaking upon the measures it has in charge on the floor, while the other members of the House should simply act as a jury in passing upon the merits of the questions discussed. Mr. Burke used to compare the House of Commons to a jury which had to sit in judgment upon either the conduct and measures of the ministry, or upon legislation proposed by the committees of the House. The House of Commons might also be compared to a mass meeting of representative citizens in a town hall, so free and easy do the members move around, or sit with their hats on, as if met to transact business and not make parade. Yes, sir, with their hats on, because, in general, since the middle ages, with the Western race, the cap, the hat, and to remain covered, have always been regarded as the emblem and the evidence of liberty and independence. This House used to keep its hats on, too, previous to 1837, but during that year the spirit of aristocratic decorum and self-assertion, or something else, which so reduced the number of the House in 1842, was abroad in full vigor, and forced the people's Representatives here to lay aside the symbol of the people's sovereignty.

I do not think we ought to have more than twelve or fifteen committees, and that the members ought to be permitted to select their committees. In case any committee should have an excess of volunteers from any political party in it, names could be drawn out by lot until the excess should be reduced. In this way there would be but little excuse for confusion or collision, and nearly every member could get on the committee most congenial to him and for which he is best fitted, while reducing the excess of volunteers on the committee by lot would prevent anything like favoritism or corruption in packing it. At present our committees are too small for the size of the House, and we have too many committees appointed to consider frivolous subjects. Our committees have not a sufficient number of members either to grapple rightly with measures or to command the confidence and the respect of the House, especially the most important committees, such as Ways and Means, Appropriations, &c. The two or three most important committees ought also, it seems to me, to have at least one member from each State.

This is my plan for reforming the abuses which exist in the government of this body. It becomes more and more apparent every day that neither a petty nor a packed committee will be permitted much longer to domineer over the House. An infant had as well attempt to put his swaddling clothes on his father.

I would like to talk much more on the advantages of having a large House, but perhaps instead of doing that I had better reply to some more objections made against it. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] seemed to be very much distressed at the quantity of time that would be consumed in taking the yeas and nays if we had a House of five or six hundred members. Well, all the indispensable business that ought to be done here will be done, whether the House consists of six thousand or sixty. Good laws always pass themselves among a free people who have a properly organized government. It would not take much longer to call the yeas and nays then than it does now under the new rules, because we consume a heap more time now than we did under the old rules for taking the yeas and nays. Then, if any gentleman was absent during the roll-call he rose and obtained permission to vote, and little or no time was occupied. But now the clerk has to call the roll of all absentees, and I have felt sorry for him frequently, knowing he hates to work so much for nothing. [Laughter.] But that little matter of consuming time can easily be remedied, and is remedied in several of the large legislative assemblies of Europe. They have there got a machine by which you vote "aye" or "no" by electricity; you just touch a little wire at your desk. I have been told that my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] either invented such a machine or knows something about it. I would like to ask him in all seriousness if such a labor-saving machine has not been invented and perfected and is not now being applied in some of the legislatures in Europe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask for only a few minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman's request.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thank the House for its indulgence.

Mr. Speaker, I rejoice from the center of my heart that a better day appears dawning upon this country than has been witnessed since the war, and even long before the war. I sincerely believe, as I have stated, that the war was brought on very largely, if not entirely, by the small representation of the people in their Federal Government, and that nothing will serve so much to restore cordial relations as enlarged representation upon this floor.

Representatives of America, my heart goes out warmly toward you, and, my countrymen from the North and from the South, let us be friends. We were so once, why not again? True, we have had a bitter quarrel, and even a bloody war, but why should that longer keep us apart? The best of families will fall out sometimes, and when two brothers disagree the one that forgives and forgets first is the better of the two. We must become friends some time, and why not now? We have had but one civil war, while England and France and many other nations have had several, yet now they are one people, and all trace of discord has long passed away. In our family difficulty you got the better of it, and therefore can afford to be magnanimous; so let us say unto each other, as Ruth unto Naomi, "Thy people shall be my people, thy God my God."

With this end in view let us try to bring the North and the South, the East, and the West nearer together. I fervently believe it can be done in no better way than by enlarging representation here and increasing it in the Senate by admitting a hundred, or even two hundred, new States into the Union. At the same time let us keep up a strong and numerous body of local legislators in the States to protect their reserved rights. This is the way to nationalize the population, and socialize the States; this is the way to make us truly "one and indivisible" and cause every American to exclaim with pride, "E pluribus unum—esto perpetua." [Great applause.]

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, obtained the floor.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. If my colleague will yield the floor for that purpose I will move that the House now adjourn. I understand that he does not feel very well, and would prefer to go on with his argument to-morrow.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3870) to change the name of the National Mechanics' Banking Association of New York to that of Wall Street National Bank; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 127) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees of the House shall begin.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. TURNER,] that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 71, noes 74.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. RANDALL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, and Mr. PAGE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 66, noes 106.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman on the other side in charge of this bill whether his object is to have a vote upon it to-night.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Under the notice which I gave the House the other day there is yet one hour for general debate. I only desire to move the previous question and then adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. Not to vote on the previous question?

Mr. PRESCOTT. To have it ordered. That is all we desire to-night; not to have a vote on the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. To adjourn pending the motion for the previous question.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Have the previous question ordered and then adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. While this matter is being arranged I desire to introduce a small bill.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to submit a report from a committee.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. I object, and call for the regular order.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is the further consideration of the apportionment bill, upon which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who desires to offer an amendment and have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to give notice to the House that I have prepared a modification of the amendment which I have heretofore offered, so as to increase the whole number of Representatives to 319, being the number adopted at the last session under the old method. My reason for that I gave the other day, so I will not dilate upon it. It is simply this, that with 307 the State of New York would get less than her present number. Even if her Legislature should redistrict the State this winter the bill would probably meet with a veto. The consequence would be that the 32 members to which New York would be entitled, of the whole number 307, would have to be elected by general ticket. That I desire to avoid as being both undemocratic and unrepublican. I have therefore taken 319 as the number that will give to New York 33 members, her present number. Then if there should be a failure for any reason to redistrict the State the old districting would continue, and no general ticket would be elected.

The modified amendment proposed by Mr. COX, of New York, is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That after the 3d of March, 1883, the House of Representatives shall be composed of 319 members, to be apportioned among the several States as follows: Alabama, 8; Arkansas, 5; California, 6; Colorado, 1; Connecticut, 4; Delaware, 1; Florida, 2; Georgia, 10; Illinois, 20; Indiana, 13; Iowa, 10; Kansas, 6; Kentucky, 11; Louisiana, 6; Maine, 4; Maryland, 6; Massachusetts, 12; Michigan, 11; Minnesota, 5; Mississippi, 7; Missouri, 14; Nebraska, 3; Nevada, 1; New Hampshire, 2; New Jersey, 7; New York, 33; North Carolina, 9; Ohio, 21; Oregon, 1; Pennsylvania, 28; Rhode Island, 2; South Carolina, 6; Tennessee, 10; Texas, 10; Vermont, 2; Virginia, 10; West Virginia, 4; Wisconsin, 8.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman propose to adopt the number 319 on the system agreed upon by the House at the last session?

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, the same old law.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Then if changing it to 320 would give Iowa what it was entitled to, and change the representation of no other State in this Union, would the gentleman be willing to adopt the number 320?

Mr. COX, of New York. I am opposed to a large number.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I suppose so, especially if the additional member would go to the State of Iowa.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would not like to give up the number 307, for the reasons I have already given. I would prefer 275, notwithstanding the eloquence of my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. TILLMAN.] But I propose now to do the best I can, and I believe the sentiment of this House is in favor of the bill of the last session. Therefore I have sent up the modification of the amendment which I offered.

The SPEAKER. Under the continuing rule of the House upon this subject, it will be printed in the RECORD. Does the gentleman ask to have his amendment read at this time?

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not.

Mr. CALKINS. I understood the gentleman to say it is a modification of his amendment which he has a right to make.

The SPEAKER. In view of the order of the House which we are now operating under, the Chair desires to understand the relation of this amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. It is a modification of my amendment, which was offered on my behalf by my colleague, [Mr. PRESCOTT,] the chairman of the committee reporting this bill.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I object to that amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. So do I.

Mr. PRESCOTT. Is it not in order as an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is in order as an amendment, and the Chair is of opinion that the gentleman has the right to modify his pending amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. That right has always been given members.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. Allow me to suggest that we are now operating under a special resolution which we adopted, to which I wish to call attention. That resolution provides that we shall vote upon all the amendments offered in their order of presentation and application to sections of this bill. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] may offer a new amendment under the guise of a modification of his former amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know that I have the right to modify my amendment, and it does not lose its place at all. That has been ruled repeatedly.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. That under the general rule the gentleman would have the right to modify his amendment is of course conceded; but we are now acting under a special rule, the resolution adopted by the House in reference to the offering of amendments to this bill, and I doubt whether the gentleman can now put in a modification of his original proposition, and thereby obtain action upon his modified amendment in advance of amendments heretofore put in.

Mr. COX, of New York. It has always been held that a member can modify his amendment at any time before the previous question is ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts. But not under the special resolution adopted in this case.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I cannot yield further, if this is to come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that this comes out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan. Certainly it does. He yielded to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. He yielded for the purpose of allowing an amendment to be offered.

Mr. COX, of New York. I have offered a modification of my amendment.

The SPEAKER. But the questions of order raised upon the introduction of the amendment, so far as they may occupy time, would not, in the opinion of the Chair, come out of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not offer this as a new amendment.

Mr. BAYNE. Then I object to it. This is more than a modification. A modification is a mere verbal change, something that does not affect the materiality or substance of the matter. This motion goes to the substance of the proposition, and is important in this respect, that it will raise the question as to voting on a given number earlier than it would be raised in the order in which the amendments have been presented. The identical amendment which the gentleman proposes is already in, having been offered by other gentlemen; and the whole object of proposing this as a modification now is to get a vote on 319 before the time when it would be regularly reached in the order in which the amendments have been presented. For a purpose of that sort, I say the gentleman cannot offer what he calls a modification of his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that this question had better be dealt with when it is reached. All the Chair has now decided is that the gentleman may modify his amendment. The Chair has not decided that it gives the gentleman the right to call his modified amendment the first amendment pending under the rule. The Chair will not decide that question either way now.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have the rule read.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. BAYNE. I understand, then, Mr. Speaker, that this modified amendment will not come up when the original amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York would come up.

Mr. COX, of New York. The Chair has not decided that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided anything further than the right of the gentleman to modify his amendment. What status it will have among the various amendments the Chair has not decided, and does not feel called upon to decide now.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HUMPHREY. As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] who now holds the floor is unwell and would prefer not to go on with his remarks this evening, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 69, noes 75.

Mr. RANDALL. As the vote is so close I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us test the question first by tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. No; let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 94, nays 112, not voting 86, as follows:
